On his return to Ethiopia, M. taught at Asfa Wäsän School in Addis Abäba. During a three-year research fellowship in Portugal, beginning in 1961, he mastered Portuguese, a skill which enabled him to become a pre-eminent authority on 16th and 17th-cent. Ethiopian history. His first book, a joint publication with Girma Beshah (1964), was a direct outcome of this fruitful sojourn. Nor would his ground-breaking Ph.D. dissertation (1971) have been conceivable without his mastery of the Portuguese sources so crucial to a reconstruction of the history of that period.

M. taught at the Department of History of Haile Sellassie I University (↗Addis Ababa University) from 1964 until his retirement in 1999, when, in recognition of his long and dedicated service, he was made Professor Emeritus. He headed the Department during some of the most turbulent years of the country's history (1973–82), resuming his work in 1986–90. In that capacity, he was also member of the Advisory Board of the ↗Institute of Ethiopian Studies. He served in various of the University ad hoc and standing committees and was a member of its highest body, the Senate (1987–89). For about a decade starting in 1982, he was a member of the team of historians who participated in the Swedish SAREC-sponsored project for the microfilming of Ethiopia-related archival records in various European and Middle Eastern countries – a milestone in strengthening the documentary base of the Institute of Ethiopian Studies and the launching of the Ph.D. program in history. He also collaborated with Sven Rubenson in the seminal documentation project Acta Aethiopica, co-editing the second and third volumes of that series.

M. participated in a number of conferences and colloquia both inside and outside the country. He was a member of the Organizing Committee of the Eighth ↗International Conference of Ethiopian Studies as well as of the Centenary of the ↗ᶜAdwa Victory (1984 and 1996, respectively).

M.'s publications, in both English and Amharic, covered a wide range of issues and historical periods (e.g., in PICES 4; 1984; 1985; 1997). His Ph.D. dissertation, described by one of his colleagues as "one of the most influential theses ever written on Ethiopian history", remains unpublished.

M. is remembered above all as a dedicated teacher who shared his vast knowledge of Ethiopian history with freshmen as well as with graduate and post-graduate students with equal enthusiasm. M. was survived by his wife, two sons and a daughter.

Marginalized people

M.p. is a theoretical concept used to describe a phenomenon in the context of social division of labour and social segregation or stratification wide-spread in the Horn of Africa: occupational socio-cultural minority groups separated from the agrarian producers by a system of – often reciprocal – cultural regulations and taboos. Such occupational groups are often perceived and described as "despised groups" excluded from a core society of "commoners" but living in tight interrelation with it. Marginalization is just one possible perspective to look at the phenomenon but this view is still influential in the scholarly discourse until today; and it also had some impact on emancipation and identity issues (↗Ethnicity) among the groups concerned here.

Freeman – Pankhurst (2003: 1–8) identified marginalization by varying degrees of (1) spatial segregation, (2) economical discrimination, (3) political disempowerment, (4) social exclusion, and (5) cultural subordination and negative stereotyping. The general model for the concept describes M.p. as social minorities excluded from the political organization of the agrarian "commoners" and endowed with limited judicial rights. Only slaves (↗Slavery) had a lower status. Economically, M.p. were mostly restricted to non-agricultural occupations, and earned their living as craftsmen (↗Handicrafts). Typical occupations of M.p. are, e.g., carpentry or woodwork (↗Wood), ↗pottery and tannery (↗Leather), and ↗hunting, but they may also cover ritually important tasks. Others may work as musicians (cp. also ↗Ǝnzata, ↗Lalibäločč), heralds or jesters. Occupations such as forging (↗Blacksmiths; ↗Iron), ↗weaving and basket weaving (↗Basketry) are usually not despised and may also be carried out by peasants.

Typical M.p. were excluded from landownership with the justification that they were considered to have certain ritually ambivalent or "polluting" qualities and, therefore, could harm the fertility of the soil or crops and livestock. Often they were accused to bear the evil eye (↗Buda) and to have some relation with ↗hyenas. M.p. in many cases dwelled at the edge of the settlements and they were not buried at the cemeteries of commoners. When interacting with commoners, M.p. were obliged to show their submissiveness towards them.

Most occupational groups practiced endogamy towards the commoners. Intermarriage with members of other occupational groups in some cases was permitted. Endogamy, occupational specialization, separate ethnicity and the ways of discrimination led scholars to designate them as "low castes" or "castes" (e.g., cp. VSAe III, 1, s. index; Todd 1977: 404ff.). However, as Amborn (1990) has shown, the concept of "caste", modelled after the Indian caste-system (or more precisely varna-system), is not adequate for the Ethiopian cases.

In the south-western regions the social segregation and symbolic marginalization of craftsmen is much more institutionalized than in other areas of Ethiopia. The so-called ↗Fuga among the ↗Gurage, ↗Kambaata and ↗Hadiyya, the ↗Manǧo and Mano/Mana among the ↗Käfa, ↗Dawro and ↗Gamo, the Mani among the ↗Malo, the Šinašša (different from ↗Šinašša) among the ↗Wälaytta, the Hadiččo among the ↗Sidaama, and the Hawuda among the ↗Konso are some examples of such groups of craftsmen.

Often hunters among the M.p. are specialized in hunting particular kinds of game, considered to be impure by the commoners; like in the case of the ↗Wäyṭo and the "Fuga", who are known for their consumption of ↗hippopotamus. The hunting methods of hunters such as the hunting with dogs or by bow and arrow or nets, are mostly rejected by commoners.

According to the symbolic value ascribed to their economic specialization there is a social hierarchy among the different occupational groups. For example in Kambaata and Hadiyya the socially subordinate "Fuga" are potters (women, husbands as helpers) and tanners (men, women as helpers) whereas the smiths (tumaano) also cultivate on their own land and usually have the same status as peasants.

Traditional rural economy is based on tied economic relations between the specialized workers, who provide the peasants with various items of daily use and the peasants/landowners, who secure the workers' supply with agricultural products. There is a vivid economic, social and cultural exchange and interaction between the craftsmen and the peasants. In certain rituals, such as lifecycle events, M.p. may play an important role. Despite this deep socio-economical and ritual interdependence, on the emic ideological level, both the craftsmen and peasants are seen as two completely disparate categories of people.

Historical processes of marginalization

Various theories have been developed on the question of the origins of the phenomena subsumed under the concept of M.p. It was proposed (e.g., by Cerulli [CerEt vol. 1: 80, 187, 190, 195, 229, 231, 234–38, vol. 2: 17, 200; 1954]; Jensen [1936: 36ff., 104ff.] and Straube [VSAe III]) that M.p. may represent the "remnants" of earlier or autochthonous ethnic groups, that were subsequently subdued and marginalized by "superior" immigrants. Haberland (1964) suggested that in the case of such invaders, coming from the northern Ethiopian realm, brought with them groups of craftsmen that subsequently mixed with the conquered population.

Another explanation for the existence of occupational groups is that the social stratification developed out of differentiation of social tasks carried out by interdependent social segments. The differentiation may be essentially a result of the internal division of labour driven primarily by economic factors (not cultural as with the caste system). According to Amborn (1990: 10f. et passim), specialist groups are to be seen in the context of the differentiation of a society of which they are not a marginal but important integral part. Such differentiation is not restricted to state or early state societies but is also to be observed in non-centralized societies.

Intensive agricultural production and the production of tools and material culture in general necessitate different methods of production and organization of working processes. Certain items cannot be produced parallel to, or combined with, agricultural activities by every member of society. For their production special skills and materials are necessary and too much time, or a different temporal rhythm, is needed for this kind of work. A consequence of the incompatibility of work processes was the social division of labour between agrarian producers and different groups of specialists (ibid. 19, 22, 48, 50).

Important differences between agriculturalists and specialist groups do directly result from the different materials as well as modes and organization of work. In order to purchase necessary raw materials and to market their products craftsmen have to be also traders. Therefore, they have a high degree of mobility and more contact to other, sometimes alien, societies, or may even migrate permanently (ibid. 333).

While agricultural production strongly depends on the natural conditions and, in the traditional worldview, on the supernatural (e.g., ↗ancestors), craftsmen create their products themselves. The processes of production are not fully understood by non-craftsmen who, therefore, may ascribe ambivalent or dangerous magical skills or qualities to specialist groups (ibid. 313, 334f.).

The social and symbolic position of the specialist groups separate them from the agriculturalists; this very distance allows, however, them to fulfil certain ritual functions in the society. Therefore, their separation allows also their integration (ibid. 334).

Based on a phenomenological analysis Freeman (2003: 301ff.) constructed four categories of specialist groups (s. below). They may share historical similarities (migration, conquest, the development of increasing political complexity) in the processes which led to their formation and marginalization as minorities. However, Amborn's hypothesis was not considered by Freeman, and deeper studies on the individual groups in their social and historical context may lead to other categorizations.

The first category is that of craftsmen, which are not to be considered M.p. in the full sense, but share their status as distinct group of specialists. Only little social and no spatial distance is kept to them. They are agriculturist landowners, not necessarily endogamous and not seen as impure. Neither they have a special role in the rituals of the peasant nor do they have separate rituals. Examples of such groups are the smiths (Nəfurä and Wägačä) in Gurage and Dawro and the weavers (Šamer/Šamano) in Gurage and Käfa. According to oral history most of these groups in southern Ethiopia came from the north. Smiths and weavers may have come together with the northerners during the 16th-cent. expansion of the Christian kingdom, where they already had a comparable social position (Freeman 2003: 304ff.).

A second category is characterized by negative stereotyping and the belief that the occupational groups concerned might bring misfortune or infertility. Sometimes they may be accused of eating impure meat. They may live among or in the periphery of the agriculturalists and have little ethnic distance. According to origin myths their occupation was imposed on them by the king or they chose it on their own. They have no separate rituals. Examples for this type are the tanners (Awačo, Degala) in Sidaama, ↗Dokko and Dawro, Wälaytta and Gamo and the weavers, smiths, tanners, potters and butchers (Hawuda) among the Konso (Freeman 2003: 306ff.).

The woodworkers, tanners and potters in Kambaata, Hadiyya, Gurage and the hunters in Käfa (the Manǧo) may be subsumed under a third category. The landowners traditionally consider them "lawless" and "uncivilized" and associate them with the wild bush. They are accused of eating impure meat and are believed to smell. Their alleged supernatural powers are considered dangerous but they also fulfil a ritual role linked to the peasants' rituals and connected to the maintenance of fertility. They have their own separate rituals. Due to their alleged ritually ambivalent character, they mostly live on the periphery and are buried separately. Legends often tell that they fell from grace because of a certain impure act (Freeman 2003: 309–12).

Perhaps the most despised occupational groups, such as the smiths (Gitsu/Gito) in Malo, ↗Aari and ↗Dime, are seen as a completely different kind of people, with whom contact should be avoided as far as possible. Stereotyping and discrimination in their case is most extreme. They are said to control strong magic powers and to eat impure meat. However, they are not associated with fertility. They have no role in peasant rituals and are feared for their alleged dangerous powers (Freeman 2003: 312f.).

Emancipation

Early attempts to improve the symbolic and social status of craftsmen date already to the reign of aṣe ↗Mənilək II. According to aläqa Täklä Iyäsus Waqǧera's chronicle (Girma Getahun 1991: 279), already this emperor issued a decree which interdicted the defamation of craftsmen as ↗däbän ansa (ibid.; cp. also KaneDic 1786). The Italian occupational administration in its propaganda defined the craftsmen as "workers" as did the Socialist government after the ↗Revolution of 1974. Notwithstanding the anti-discrimination policy (equal rights, access to land etc.) of the Därg, in many cases discrimination continues or even increased again under the current government. Especially negative stereotyping can be observed until today and the fear of evil eye still is alive. Today, some M.p. started to struggle for political representation and social rights. Protestant and Catholic missions as well as modern Islam in many cases successfully introduced their concept of equality. The more the rural areas become part of greater trade networks, the more local craft products have to compete with industrially produced commodities and imported products. Many craftsmen migrated to the cities or became members of the army to improve their living standard. Others developed local micro-strategies, such as the foundation of special ↗əddər-cooperatives that organize the sale of their crafts, in order to improve their position.

Abunä M.K. (መርሐ ፡ ክርስቶስ, birth name Fəṣṣum Bərhan, monastic name before bishopry Yared; b. 22 March 1927, Ç̣äläqot Śəllase, Ǝndärta, d. 6 February 2008, Addis Abäba) was a prominent ecclesiastic of the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church (EOTC).

Son of qes Gərmay Gäbrä Iyäsus and wäyzäro Taddäläčč Täklä Haymanot, Fəṣṣum Bərhan received his primary church ↗education from his father, and studied ↗dəggʷa, ↗məᶜəraf and ↗aqqʷaqʷam from mämhər Qälämäwärq in Ç̣äläqot Śəllase. He later studied ↗qəne under liqä ḫəruyan Wäldä Sänbät in Zobəl Angot Mädḫane ᶜAläm; mämhər Ṭəbäbu Gämme in Śəre Mädḫane ᶜAläm (Sälale); mämhər Maᶜəbäl Fänte Wase in Wašära (Goǧǧam); and mämhər Qalä Maᶜənäq Täsämma in Däbrä Mäwiᵓ Maryam (Goǧǧam). He subsequently taught qəne in Goǧǧam before continuing his studies of the commentary (↗tərgʷame) under mämhər Ləyäw Mulu in Moṭa Giyorgis and aläqa Ḫəruy Fanta in Addis Abäba (N.T.); and liqä liqawənt Ayyälä Alämu and aläqa Ṭərunäh Kasa in Addis Abäba (O.T.). He also studied all subjects of the ↗mäṣḥaf bet.

M.K. was ordained deacon, by the name Yared, by abunä Yəsḥaq; then joined ↗Däbrä Libanos (Šäwa) and was ordained priest by abunä Yoḥannəs. He was also given the title mäggabe śərᶜat and taught at Taᶜəka Nägäśt Bäᶜata Lämaryam monastery memorial school (1967–69) and in Mäq̱älä at different parishes. He was also yädäbr aläqa of Ç̣äläqot Śəllase.

In 1978, M.K. was ordained bishop (↗p̣ap̣ṗas) by abunä ↗Täklä Haymanot and appointed Bishop of Eritrea diocese (1978–80). He subsequently served as Archbishop of Dərre Dawa (1980–84), Western Harärge and Dərre Dawa (1988–90), and Təgray (1990–93 and 1998–2000).

M.K. also served as Chair of the Scholars Council (Liqawənt gubaᵓe, s. ↗Liq; 1984–88) and Head of the Sunday School Department of the Patriarchate. He was also the dean of the ↗Theological College of St. Paul (1993–97), ↗Holy Trinity Theological College (1997–98) and St. Frumentius Abunä Sälama Theological College (2001–05), where he also taught many EOTC disciplines.

From 2000 until his death in 2008 M.K. was Archbishop of the Mäqälä diocese and professor at the Frumentius Abunä Sälama Theological College.

Beside teaching in different colleges and parishes, M.K. was active as traditional scholar. He published four theological books (1967/68; 1999a; 1999b; 2003) and gave public lectures (e.g., at Addis Ababa University in May 2005 on the traditional pronunciation ድምፀ ፡ ፊደላት (Dəmṣ́ä fidälat, 'Sound[s] of the fidäl').

Amsalu Tefera

Marrassini, Paolo

M. (b. 16 March 1942, Florence, d. 10 January 2013, Florence) was an eminent scholar in Semitic and ↗Ethiopian Studies.

M.'s father Dante was a cartographer employed at the Istituto Geografico Militare, Florence, while his mother Clara Bosi was a primary school teacher. After attending the gymnasium and classical high school, in 1961 M. entered the University of Florence, first enrolling at the Faculty of Law, then moving to the Faculty of Arts in 1962. He studied linguistics and Semitic Studies under the eminent Italian Semitist Pelio Fronzaroli (in turn a pupil of Giacomo Devoto and Sabatino Moscati). M. got his M.A. degree in 1967, with a thesis on the lexicon of military architecture in 1st millennium A.D. Semitic (published 1971).

Having taught in school for some years, from 1971 until 1982 M. was research fellow in Semitic Philology at the University of Florence. After initially taking interest in Assyriology (among his long-time acquaintances was Jean Bottéro) and linguistic palaeontology (also including Near East archaeology), M. turned his attention to Ethiopian Studies. In 1974–76 he attended the seminars held at the Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei by Stefan ↗Strelcyn under the auspices of Enrico ↗Cerulli. With the latter's support, M. followed Strelcyn's courses in Manchester in 1975–76. In 1977, M. became adjunct professor at the University of Pisa, first for Hebrew (1977–78) and then for Semitic Philology (1978–82).

During this period, sponsored by Cerulli, M. completed his first major Ethiopianist publication, the critical edition with introduction and annotated translation of the Gädlä ↗Yoḥannəs Məśraqawi (1981). In this work M. introduced two profound innovations: the application of a modern philological method to Ethiopic text editions and the appreciation of the hagiographical literature (↗hagiography) in its proper sense. M. consistently maintained the so-called "neo-Lachmannian" approach (also noted by Contini 1990: 66), which he explicitly defended in later contributions (e.g., 1987a; 1996; 2003; 2008; 2009). As for his approach to hagiography, he later extended it also to historical texts, at the example of the so-called "chronicle" of aṣe ↗^{c}Amdä Ṣəyon (MarAmdS 22–39), and other case studies.

In 1983 M. became Associate Professor for Ethiopic language and literature at the University of Florence, also teaching Semitic Philology (1983–84). In 1990, under the auspices of Lanfranco ↗Ricci, M. succeeded Luigi ↗Fusella as Full Professor for ↗Gə^{c}əz language and literature at the ↗Istituto Universitario Orientale of Naples. His additional charges included chairing the academic programme for Oriental languages and civilizations in 1991–93, teaching Coptic (1990–91) and Semitic linguistics (1991–93).

In 1994 M. was called to the chair of Ancient Ethiopic language and literature at the University of Florence. He continued teaching Gə^{c}əz language at literature at Naples in 1994–95, where he also remained, for the rest of his life, an active member of the Ph.D. programme in African studies, coordinated by Alessandro Triulzi.

In Florence, M. was President of the academic programme for Humanities (1996–98), and later Dean of the Faculty of Arts for two terms (1998– 04). After Fronzaroli's becoming emeritus in 2003, M. assumed the Chair of Semitic Philology, in which he remained until his retirement in 2009.

In addition to his work in Florence, M. was active teaching internationally. He did much for promoting studies in Ethiopic philology in Ethiopia and was among the initiators of the graduate programmes in Philology at ↗Addis Ababa University. He was Adjunct Professor of that University since the launch of the M.A. and Ph.D. programmes respectively in 2004 and 2007 and until after his retirement, teaching several courses and tutoring dozens of students. In 2008 he was Guest Professor for Ethiopian Studies at the University of Hamburg.

M. was a member of several scientific associations. Their range testifies to the wide spectrum of his interests. They include the Istituto Italiano per l'Africa e l'Oriente, the Associazione Italiana per lo Studio del Giudaismo, the Association pour l'Étude de la Littérature Apocryphe Chrétienne, the Associazione per lo Studio della Santità, dei Culti e dell'Agiografia, and the Società Italiana di Glottologia. He was also among the founders and director of the Centre for Theoretical and Historical Linguistics: Italian, European and Oriental Languages, at the University of Florence.

M. was the Italian representative (since 2003) in the International Organizing Committee of the ↗International Conferences of Ethiopian Studies. From 2010 until his death M. was the editor-in-chief of the ↗Rassegna di Studi Etiopici, of which he edited the issues 3 (2012) and 4 (2013) of the new series. M. was also member of several editorial boards, including the journals Africa (Rome) and ↗Aethiopica (1998–2000), as well as the EAE.

M.'s scholarly achievements ranged from Ancient Semitic and Assyriology to Ethiopian Studies, from comparative and historical linguistics to philology as text criticism and hagiography, from manuscript cataloguing to religious studies, from Old and New Testament apocrypha to the history of Oriental Studies. He substantially contributed to Semitic lexicography and linguistics, with a special attention to South Semitic classification (s., e.g., Marrassini 2007; 2010; ↗Ethio-Semitic); to the critical edition of Ethiopic hagiographic and historical texts; to the vast field of apocrypha, in Ethiopic (↗Pseudepigrapha and apocrypha) as well as in other languages (s., e.g., Id. in EtRicci); to manuscript studies, with his catalogue of the Ethiopic ↗manuscripts of the Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana, Florence (s. Id. 1987b–88); to several crucial questions in Christian Ethiopian history and culture, such as the so-called ↗Syriac and Jewish influences (s. Id. 1999), and others.

M. was a passionate and sensitive person, a meticulous investigator with a broad cultural horizon, a devoted and generous teacher, and a methodological innovator in all the fields he dealt with. He was friend of such scholars as David Cohen, Maxime ↗Rodinson, Taddesse Tamrat (Taddäsä Tammərat), and many others.

M. is survived by his wife Maria Antonia, a daughter, and a son.

V Early marriage

The term early M. refers here to M., arranged before or after the birth of the future couple, before the age of 18. It is a widespread custom in the Horn of Africa and is practiced by followers of all religions in the rural sphere as an integral part of traditional culture until today.

Among ruling families early M. was mostly practiced in order to forge political alliances, to accumulate wealth and to avoid the loss of land. Historical examples for such dynastic early M. are the M. of the 6-year-old ↗Zäwditu (later ətege) with the 13-year-old ↗Arᵓaya Śəllase (later ras), or of ras ↗Ḫaylu Täklä Haymanot's daughter, Säblä Wängel, who married ləǧ ↗Iyasu, when she was 14 (Alemante Amera 2004; Heran 2005; 2006; Pankhurst 1979).

According to Guday Emirie's study in two districts of Western Goǧǧam four typologies of early M. can be identified:

(1) yäqal kidan gabəčča 'marriage of matrimony', i.e. promissory M. betrothal before birth;
(2) yanqälba gabəčča, lit. 'marriage of the anqälba [leather backpack for carrying a baby]', i.e. M. of a newborn or between the age of 1 and 2. In this case the bride remains at her parents' home till she reaches the appropriate age to live with her husband;
(3) yämadägo gabəčča, lit. 'marriage of the madägo [i.e. child of either sex raised as a servant of the family], i.e. M. of a girl-child between the age of 5 and 9. The bride is expected to commute between the parents' and in-laws' families until she reaches the age of 10;
(4) yäləǧənnät gabəčča, i.e. the M. between females aged 10 to 14 and males aged 15 to 17. The bride aged 10 to 11 is expected to live with her in-laws. After reaching the age of 12 to 13 she is expected to establish, together with her husband, her own household next to her in-laws' homestead.

The theme of early M. has been object of a number of contemporary Amharic novels, among which የልብ ፡ ሐሳብ ፤ የብርሃንና ፡ የጽዮን ፡ ሞገሳ ፡ ጋብቻ (Yäləbb ḥassab: yäbərhanənna yäṣəyon mogäsa gabəčča, 'Heartly Desire: the Marriage of Bərhan and Ṣəyon Mogäsa', Addis Abäba: Goha Ṣäbah 1930) by Ḫəruy Wäldä Śəllase, የልምዣት (Yälməžat, 'day-night dream') by Ḥaddis Alämayyähu (Addis Abäba: Kuraz Publishing Agency 1988).

Socio-cultural and economic factors

The virginity of the bride is considered a fundamental prerequisite for early M. Since Ethiopians give a high social and cultural value to virginity, a girl is expected to be a virgin at her first M. In case the bride is not a virgin the M. is dissolved and she is sent back to her family which seldom welcomes her back. Therefore, parents might give their daughters in M. at an early age in order to protect them from pre-marital sex and to be recognized for their capability to look after their daughters properly (Guday Emirie 2005: 93; s. also Haile Gabriel Dagne 1994: 36; Mitike Molla – Yemane Berhane – Lindtjørn 2008, passim; Berihun M. Mekonnen – Aspen 2011: 436). Furthermore, the economic value of a woman (in terms of mača 'dowry') is higher if she is virgin and it decreases if she is married or has children.

Other socio-cultural factors behind early M. are: (a) the desire of the parents to see the M. of their daughter and/or a grand-child before they pass away (saləmot abäbayen ləy 'before I pass away, let me see my flower'); (b) fear of being considered as undesirable for M. and, consequently, stigmatized as qomo qärräčč 'impossible to marry' or as galämota 'left over', 'not wanted', then 'dissolute woman'; (c) when the request for M. is negotiated by the elders (šəmagəlle mälak) or by a family of such a status that a negative answer is unthinkable (Amhara, Təgray), or, as in Oromiyaa, when the request is from a balä wəkabi (a person in control of/controlled by a wəkabi ↗spirit) or ordered by him; (d) the need to marry before menstruation (Argobba), to stake first-claim (Təgray), to give a ↗wedding feast (Amhara, Kəmant), as a repayment for attending that of others, to get the services of a son-in-law (Agäw), and fear of abduction (Oromo); (d) the competition to find a good match for their daughters increasing the social capital of the family urges the parents to marry their children as soon as they find someone considered a suitable bridegroom; (e) the high respect and consideration that the community shows the father who marries her daughter as early as possible; (f) the necessity that the daughter will be subservient to her in-laws and to her husband, if he is adult enough, drives the parents to marry her out while she is still a child, which means when she still does not have the required maturity to make decisions for herself (Alemante Amera 2004; Guday Emirie 2005: 46ff., 137ff.; Haile Gabriel Dagne 1994: 35f.).

Alongside socio-cultural reasons some of the economic factors behind early M. are to be mentioned: (a) the will to organize an exemplary wedding in order to acquire social prestige; (b) to strengthen economic alliances with well-off families; (c) to bequeath the land and the cattle to the sons.

Psychological and physical effects

Sexual intercourse (s. also ↗Sexuality) between the bride (below the age of 9) and her husband is formally forbidden. According to the custom of early-childhood M. arrangements, the mother-in-law should protect the bride from her son's sexual advance until she reaches the customary age of a young married girl for sleeping with her husband (läʿaqəmä hewan 'the age of Eve'), usually 9 years or above. The custom of protecting the young married girl from sexual intercourse with her husband is locally known as gedo (Guday Emirie 2005: 125f.).

The experience of early M. has serious effects both on the physical and mental health of the female children: (a) they are forced to loveless M. which may end in running away from their husband, sometimes into ↗prostitution; (b) they are denied education; (c) their first sexual intercourse mostly occurs against their will and may be a proper rape; (d) they started childbearing when their bodies are physiologically not mature enough to carry a pregnancy which results in a high maternal mortality; (d) the premature pregnancy very often causes obstructed labour, damage to the uterus and to the vagina, and obstetric fistula; the victims of fistula being mostly abandoned by their husbands and handed off on the fringes of society (Alemante Amera 2004; Erulkar 2004; Guday Emirie 2005; Haile Gabriel Dagne 1994; Yamrot Girma 2008).

Early marriage today

While the Civil Code of 1960 set the minimum age of M. for girls at 15 years and for boys at 18 years (Guday Emirie 2005: 31ff.), nowadays early M. is illegal in Ethiopia. In the Revised Family Code of Ethiopia (213/2000) the minimum legal age of M. for both girls and boys is 18 years. The law also establishes equal rights for both men and women in the formation of M., during M. and at its dissolution. Furthermore, the Revised Penal Code (626-627/2005) penalizes the sexual abuse of children with imprisonment from 13 to 25 years for a man guilty of sexual activity with a child below the age of 13, and from three to 15 years imprisonment where the child is between the age of 13 and 18.

Although the Ethiopian government laws-policies legislate against early M. the custom is still largely attested.

The persistence of the tradition depends on several factors (Berihun M. Mekonnen – Aspen 2011: 438, 442f.), and firstly on the fact that, early M. being a cultural norm, no one considers it as an illegal issue. Furthermore, like with female genital mutilation (↗Circumcision, female), government officials who are themselves part of the local community often are reluctant to enforce national laws contradicting old-established local practices (Guday Emirie 2005: 163).

The Transitional Civil Code of Eritrea also abolished, in 1991, the discriminatory clauses and gave women a higher level of protection, including the minimum age of M. of 18 years (these clauses do not apply to M. governed by ↗šarīʿa law). Despite the laws, early M. is still a persistent custom also in Eritrea (Silkin 1989).

According to a survey carried out in 1997 (National Committee on Traditional Practices in Ethiopia [NCTPE], today Yäʾitoṗya Goǧi Ləmadawi Dərəǧətočč Aswogaǧ Maḫbär ['Ethiopian Harmful Practices Elimination Committee', EGLDAM]), the prevalence rate of early M. at the national level is 54 %. In Eritrea the rate of early M. is 46 %.

Guday Emirie's study on Western Goǧǧam allows recognizing, in the areas investigated, an evolution in the custom of early M.: 98.69 % of the daughters got married between 80 days after birth to 9 years, whereas 99.71 % of their mothers were married off between the ages of 10 to 17. This means that within one generation the average age at first M. reduced from 11 to 8 years (Guday Emirie 2005: 137).

Matewos

Märigeta M. (ማቴዎስ, in oral tradition "Awsteli ʿ*abi*", 'the elder Apostoli'; b. ca. 1800, ʿAdwa, d. after 1840s) was the first known Təgrayan translator of the Bible into ↗Təgrəñña (↗Bible translation into Təgrəñña).

M. was the son of a Greek craftsman called Apostoli (Tgn.: Awsteli), who worked in the service of the Təgrayan prince Wäldä Gäbrəʾel in ʿAdwa. Däbtära M. was first mentioned in 1835, the year in which the Protestant missionaries Samuel ↗Gobat and Carl Wilhelm ↗Isenberg arrived in ʿAdwa. M. was hired by them to translate the Four Gospels into Təgrəñña, which he did by 1837. His translation was based on a European Vorlage, possibly Greek. The manuscript was sent to Europe, revised by Isenberg and published 30 years later by Johann Ludwig ↗Krapf (1866). Another version of the Gospels in Təgrəñña is also attributed to him. This one was translated on the basis of a Gəʿəz Vorlage and is greatly influenced by this language; it is possibly his first translation attempt (unpublished, with exception of a small extract in Praetorius 1871, annex 1–6; cp. UllBibl 69).

It seems that later M. converted to Catholicism, possibly around the time of the expulsion of the Protestant missionaries (cp. ↗Wəbe Ḫaylä Maryam). In 1838 M., now called märigeta, appears as the spokesman of the clergy of St. Gabriel of ʿAdwa, declaring their allegiance to the Pope. In the 1840s he was an important informant for the French traveller ↗Lefèbvre; the geographical lexicon found in his book was prepared by M.

M. was the father-in-law of the Təgrayan officer bašša Ǧəhon (also Ǧon, "John", the Ethiopian son of Mansfield ↗Parkyns). M.'s brother was Əngəda Apostoli, who at times acted as the legal representative for the d'↗Abbadie brothers in Təgray; Əngəda's grand-daughter married the Təgrayan governor ras ↗Mängäša Yoḥannəs.

May Anbäsa Kidanä Məḥrät

M.A. (ማይ ፡ አንበሳ ፡ ኪዳነ ፡ ምሕረት) is a monastery located in the district of May Anbäsa, in ↗Əndärta, East Təgray.

M.A. is located ca. 20 km north-east from ↗Mäqälä, in an area with many traces of historical monastic activities. It lies on a terraced mountain slope, above the River Gəba. A cave under the drop of the waterfall located nearby is said to have been a former church dedicated to abunä ↗Zärʾa Buruk. Traces of construction and dwelling use inside, as well as the presence of a tabot dedicated to Zärʾa Buruk in the main church, render this tradition credible.

The old main church of M.A. was dismantled years ago; the new church is a recent rectangular structure at the very entrance to the monastic compound. Besides the main tabot of Kidanä Məḥrät and the tabot of Zärʾa Buruk, the church hosts the *tabot*s dedicated to the Holy Trinity (Śəllase) and, reportedly, ↗Kiros. Deep inside the settlement, there is another small round church, currently used as ↗ʿ*əqa bet*.

According to local tradition, the monastery was founded under ↗ʿAmdä Ṣəyon I in the first half of the 14th cent., by abunä Abrəham "of Qata" (KinBibl 61). He was succeeded as abbot by abunä Wäldä Tənśaʾe who is said to have come from ↗Waldəbba riding a lion, bringing the *tabot*s of Kidanä Məḥrät and Śəllase. Other prominent heads were Maḥṣäntä Maryam and, during the ↗Zämänä mäsafənt, Täklä Haymanot (a contemporary of ras ↗Wäldä Śəllase; cp. EllLusAnt 80). During the time of mämhər Kidanä Maryam (in the 18th cent.?), the monastery suffered from a raid of the Guttuu Oromo. In the 19th cent., the monastery is reported to have received land grants (↗Gʷəlt) from däǧǧazmač ↗Säbagadis Wäldu and later from aṣe ↗Yoḥannəs IV, whose vestments are reportedly preserved in the ʿ*əqa bet*. One of the most important ecclesiastic institutions of the area, M.A. was also popular with other rulers; ras ↗Alula Əngəda, ras ↗Mängäša Yoḥannəs and others are said to have visited and favoured the place.

The prominence of the monastery well into the 20th cent. is confirmed by the records of Giovanni Battista ↗Ellero, who mentions a community of over 40 monks, a major round church with a completely painted mäqdäs and a collection of over 200 ↗manuscripts (EllLusAnt 80). While there were up to 80 monks in the post-war time of ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I, the monastery declined after the ↗Revolution of 1974. Today there are no more than 15 monks. The community follows strict andənnät-rule (↗Monasticism), and, though poor, seeks to achieve complete self-subsistence. The monastery still preserves an important manuscript collection of several dozen manuscripts, none of them, however, dating into the period around M.A.'s purported foundation time (one was used by Cowley 1974; his dating of the manuscript to the 17th cent. is, however, questionable).

A small ↗nunnery called Ǝnda Mäḥṣun, with 5–7 nuns, is located some 5 km away from M.A. and is administered from M.A. Local tradition claims that it used to have been large in the past. There is a ↗ṣäbäl-source in the vicinity of the community; the church of the monastery, small and circular, resembles the old church of M.A.

Measurement

Ethiopians traditionally employed a wide range of M. units. Many were apparently of local origin, while others were based on Biblical concepts, or borrowed from Greece, Arabia, Persia, Turkey, or Western Europe. Some M. were in general use, while others were employed only for specific articles, e.g., grain, butter (↗Milk and milk products), or ↗honey, or for specific purposes, e.g., ↗trade or ↗tributes and taxation. There were innumerable regional or even seasonal variations, resulting at times in considerable imprecision. Many M. units were considered to be in a precise relationship to each other, e.g., as halves, quarters, etc. Many M. units had a market relationship to each other as well as a mathematical ratio. In order to prevent cheating, for the maintenance of the market peace and for tax collection, rulers or market communities on the local or regional level defined standard M. units, such as ↗iron cubits, standardized measuring ropes etc. which were established with some government authority.

Although the international metric system was gradually introduced from the 19th cent. onwards, in the rural context traditional M. methods often predominate even today, i.e. in traditional house construction and small scale market trade.

Volume and capacity

Volume was sometimes measured by the human body. The smallest unit was the pinch, the amount which could be held in two fingers. The amount that a person can take between the extremity of his fingers, the little handful (e.g., Amh. ቍንጣሪ q^{w}ənəṭṭari) was a bigger measure as was the mouthful (Amh. ጕርሻ g^{w}ərša). The hand was the major M. unit for market goods, such as ↗coffee, ↗spices and herbs, ↗salt, butter etc. There was differentiation between the fist or closed handful (e.g., Tgn. ዕዅቲ ^{c}ək̠^{w}əti), the palmful (Gə^{c}əz እድ əd, Tgn. ሕፍኒ ḥəfni, Amh. እጅ əğğ ['hand'], ጭብጥ č̣əbbət, ጭባጭ č̣əbbač̣ ['fist']), or double-palmful. The ጭባጦ č̣əbbaṭṭo (Tgn.) was also employed for a bundle held in one hand. In cases where the vendor's hand was considered too small, a complimentary amount was given (Amh. መርቅ märq). Based on the handful other M. were determined. In Harär, e.g., grain was measured by the ጢት ፡ ታራድ ṭit tarad (45 handfuls, Har.: käbäl, 'handful') and the ታራድ tarad (270 handfuls). Likewise the ↗qunna (Amh.) was sometimes equated with handfuls (e.g., eight double handfuls with open palm). Bigger amounts could be measured by the armful, which again determined bigger units.

Apart from M. units based on the human body, capacity was measured by different types of containers, such as specific types and sizes of baskets, cups, tins, horns, bottles, gourds and pots. A cattle horn was frequently used to measure market items like coffee. Use was also made of the mule-load (Amh., Tgn. ጫን č̣an), and of donkey-loads (of pack animals, Amh. ጘንብ ğänb, a loanword from Arab.) or camel-loads, as well as the size of a typical grain-store, or pit. Grain in particular was also measured in various containers, such as specific types and sizes of traditional baskets, gourds or skin sacks, or else imported cups or tins. Among Təgrəñña-speakers there is also employed a system of volume M. whose units are based on a container called ምሰ məssä which equals more or less one litre. The amount measured by one məssä is called an እንቅዓ ənqə^{c}a, two məssä are a ምዕሮ mə^{c}əro, four məssä are a ካዕቦ ka^{c}əbo, six məssä are a ካዕቦ ፡ ምዕሮ ka^{c}əbo mə^{c}əro, eight məssä are a ንፍቂ nəfəqi (መንፍቕቲ mänfəq̱əti), twelve məssä are a መስለስ mäsläs, 16 məssä are a ገበታ gäbäta, 128 məssä are an እንተላም əntälam and 256 məssä are a ካዕቢ ka^{c}əbi (ካዕቦ ka^{c}əbo).

An important concept in the context of tithe was the ↗dərgo (Amh., Tgr.), defined as the amount of cereals for one person for a day or one fourth of a qunna (s. above).

Dividing or uniting of items into artificial units, like the bundle (e.g., a 'load [carried on the back, e.g., a bundle of wood]', Amh. ሸክም šäkkəm or Orom. baᵓaa) was another principle used for the M. of volume.

Weight

Weight was often assessed, vaguely, by looking at an object (በዐይን ፡ መዘነ bäᶜayn mäzzänä, 'to weigh by eye'), or lifting it by hand, sometimes with another item in the other hand for comparison. Higher weights were expressed in terms of a donkey-, mule- and camel-load or a human carrier's capacity.

The principle of balance had long been applied in Ethiopia. The balance (Gəᶜəz መዳልው mädaləw) is depicted in many church paintings and Gəᶜəz texts. Scales, also known as ሚዛን mizan (from Ar. mīzān), were used to measure objects against different kinds of weights. The two types of balances used were the two-trays balance and the one-tray steelyard. For the weighing of smaller units of M. seeds and coins (↗Coinage; ↗Currency) were used. Higher weights were measured by ↗amole, natural or worked stone weights (e.g., Amh. አሞሌ ፡ ድንጋይ amole dəngay, 'amole stone'), iron weights and coins, especially ↗Maria Theresa thalers. The latter were considered as weighing a ወቄት wäqet (from Arab. wiqīya) or ounce, one of several widely used M. concepts of Arabian origin. Wäqet was especially used for the M. of gold, civet (↗Zibeth) and ↗incense. Related to the wäqet was the ነጥር näṭr (s. below) copper bullion. According to Paulitschke (1893: 330), two or two and a half (ca. 432 gr) ነጥር näṭr equalled one Maria Theresia thaler.

Some units for the M. of weights were introduced into Ethiopia through biblical texts and other foreign literature translated into Ethiopic of Hebrew origin were the Shekel (Gəᶜəz ሰቅል säqəl), the Mina (Gəᶜəz ምናን mənan) and the Talent (Gəᶜəz መክሊት mäklit) as well as the dinar (↗Dīnār); mediated through Greek texts and Arabic, Greek weights like the Drachma (ድርህም dərhəm), the Greek ounce or holkē (Gəᶜəz ሕልቅ ḥəlq) and litra (Gəᶜəz ልጥር ləṭr; Amh. näṭr), the Greek pound.

Length

Small units of length were based on the human body. The smallest units derived from the thickness of a finger (Gəᶜəz አጽባዕት aṣbaᶜət, Amh. ጣት ṭat, Tgn. ጻት ṣat, ኣጽባዕቲ aṣbaᶜəti) the length of a finger joint or the finger. The width of four fingers together was used for M. as well. The span (Amh. ስንዝር sənzər), i.e. the distance from the end of the thumb to the middle finger or the index finger was the next unit. The length of a foot (Amh. እግር əgər) or shoe (Amh. ጫማ č̣amma) was also employed as a M. as well as the step (Amh. እርምጃ ərməğğa, Tgn. ስጉምቲ səgʷəmti).

A basic unit of length M. all over the Horn of Africa was the cubit (Gəᶜəz እመት əmät; Amh. ክንድ kənd; Orom. abote, čiikili, dunduma, dagduma) mostly defined as the distance from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger taken from the inner side. Other kinds of cubits were, e.g., measured by the distance from the elbow to the wrist (Tgn. ቅልጽም qəlṣəm) or from the elbow to the end of the clenched fist. The length of the cubit was not uniform, but depended on the different methods of measurement and differences in the size of the measurer's arm. In trade the M. procedure was based on agreement and local customs. In order to settle differences, e.g., between the longer cubit at the Red Sea coast and those used in the interior, the length of one or two fingers was added, the addition called እስፊ əsfi (Eritrea) or መቃደጃ mäqqadäğa (Wällo).

Based on multiples of the cubit other M. units were in use, such as, for instance, the lemi (Orom.) defined by two cubits, the እሺል əšil (Amh.) by two or three cubits and the ğari (Orom.) extending to six cubits. The term መቃጫ mäqač̣a (Amh.) was used for a variety of lengths, such as, three cubits or the combined length of a cubit and a span or a cubit and a finger width. The cubit was also divided into smaller units, such as, e.g., the ሩብ rub (Amh., Tgr.), a quarter of a cubit, the ተሙን tämun (Eritrea), an eighth of a cubit or of a thaler and the ከቢብ käbib (Tgr.), i.e. four fifths of a cubit.

For the M. of cloth (↗Clothing), apart from cubit, span and finger, a variety of special M. units were used, such as the ጋቢ gabi (Amh.) the ሸማ šämma (Amh.), ገርባብ gärbab (Tgn., Tgr.) and the ጣቃ ṭaq̠a (Tgn.) called after specific types of cloth.

Another unit of length M. derived from the human body was the width of a man with horizontally extended arms, the ኢያሱ ፡ ቁመት Iyasu qumät or በሰው ፡ ቁመት bäsäw qumät.

For the length of about a metre the term ዱራ dura (Amh. from Arab.) was sometimes employed. For more extended lengths use was made of sticks of locally defined length, like the ሽመል šəmäl and the ዘንግ zäng or በትር bätr (Amh., Gurage etc.). In Gurage, additionally, a pole (žər) of six, seven or twelve cubits was in use. Moreover, everywhere thongs were employed for tethering mules measuring multiples of the cubit. The thong (Amh. መጫኛ mäč̣aña, Tgn. መጽዓኛ mäṣə^{c}añña), about 24 cubits or 12 m long, used to tie loads to pack animals was used widely. The thong again was divided, e.g., the mäs^{c}an of the Təgrəñña-speakers had the sub-categories ሞራን moran, i.e. half a mäs^{c}an (ca. 12 cubits or ca. 6 m), and ንስቶይ ፡ ምራን nəstoy məran, i.e. a thong of eight cubits.

Longer distances were measured with the help of a cord or rope (Amh. ገመድ gämäd, ቀላድ qälad, Gurage ወደረ wädärä, Orom. wadaroo), which was also the major means for the M. of area. The length of the rope varied locally and throughout history. While during aṣe Iyasu I's reign the ያጤ ፡ ገመድ yaṭe gämäd ('emperor's rope') was about 40 cubits or 19 m long, the gämäd by the time of aṣe Mənilək II was roughly between 63 m and 67 m. Aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I's pre-war government used a metal chain with the initials of the ruler and standardized the gämäd to 50 m.

Distances that extended beyond the reach of ropes were measured by the number of hours, weeks, months, or even years required for a journey. Old Ethiopic units for M. of longer distances were the ምዕራፍ mə^{c}əraf and the ፈረስክ färäsək, which was defined by four mə^{c}əraf. However, the estimations of travellers of a mə^{c}əraf vary from 200 spans or 50 m, up to "one Graeco-Roman stadium" or "an eighth of a Roman mile".

Land

A small area was measured in Eritrea by the square cubit (መረባዕ märäbba^{c}) of ca. 54.5 cm^2. ↗Land was measured or assessed visually by the assumed size of an ordinary plot of land, by the use of a rope, by the time needed for cultivation or by productivity. There existed several categories of size for plots of land. In Gə^{c}əz (also Tgn., Amh.) the term መደብ mädäb was used for a small plot for vegetable cultivation, between 50 m^2 and 250 m^2. In Wällo the ትልም təlm was a strip of land of ca. 269 m^2. Another small-size plot, was the ቦይ boy (Amh.), called after the ditch separating two plots, measuring ca. 700 m^2.

An important concept for the M. of land was the labour time needed. The area a man could dig in one day was called a 'day' (Amh. ቀን qän). The area ploughed by a pair of oxen in one day was the M. unit used throughout the region (Amh. ገዝም gäzm, ማሳ masa, ምድር mədər, ቀደማ qädäma, ጥማድ ṭəmmad or ጠማጅ ፡ መሬት ṭämağ märet, Harari bāra moy, ğarīb). The actual size, however, varied according to the local topographical circumstances, the design of the fields etc. between ca. 1,000 m^2 and ca. 1,800 m^2. A similar M. method used was to estimate the distance that could be ploughed before the oxen were tired and lost their ability to pull in a straight line (Amh. ፈር fär, መቃን mäqan, ቃዳ qada, ቅርጥ qərṭ).

In the contexts of the ↗gäbbar-system, land tenure and taxation, it was not the size of an area that was the major category of assessment but the estimated productivity of the land. The ሺቤታ šibeta in the Harär area, for instance, categorized area by the size of the stack of grain before threshing. Likewise, the land allocated to soldiers (↗Näfṭäñña) by the emperor, the ↗gašša varied with the quality of the soil. Sub-categories of the gašša were the ግማሽ ፡ ጋሻ gəmmaš gašša ('half gašša'), the ሲሶ siso (third of a gašša), the ኩርማን kurman (quarter of a gašša əngära) and the ተሙን tämun (eighth of a gašša).

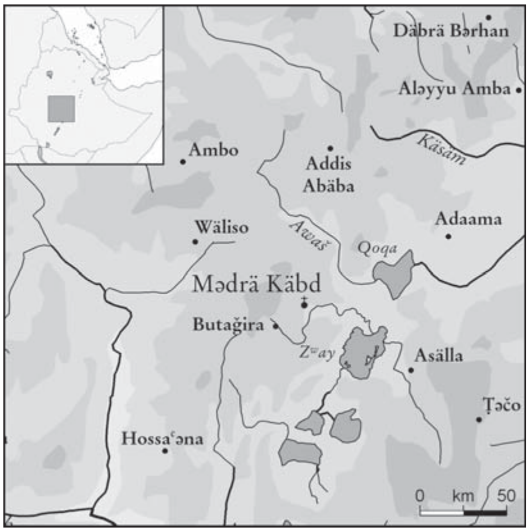
Mədrä Käbd

M.K. (ምድረ ፡ ከብድ, lit. "land of Käbd", or just Käbd, Käb[b]ad, 8°16'00" N, 38°36'00" E) is the name of a village and an ancient monastery (for possible etymologies, s. Marrassini 2003: xxx [tr.]) located on a slope above the basin of the Arsi lakes, north-west of Lake Z^{w}ay, in the old ↗Gurage district of ↗Aymällät (s. EAE vol. 5). Today, it belongs to the Dugda Bora wäräda of East Šäwa zone, Oromiyya kəlləl. The area surrounding M.K. is mostly inhabited by Ğillee ↗Oromo and Kəstane (↗Soddo).

In the late 13th cent., the area was the scene of struggles between ↗Ifat and the Christian rulers, as was commonly assumed on the basis of a reference in the so-called Arabic “Chronicle of Šäwa” (Cerulli 1941: 9, 13, 36 and n. 3; however, reservations were recently expressed about the originality and historical value of the document, s. History of ↗Šäwa). The existence of an early monastic community (↗Gädam) at M.K., by the late 14th–15th cent., can be interpreted as evidence for the early Orthodox Christian identity of the Kəstane, which emerged at that period in the course of the evangelization of the ↗Šäwa region and areas further to the south.

According to Ethiopian Orthodox Church tradition the monastery in the “land of Käbd” was founded by abunä ↗Gäbrä Mänfäs Qəddus. The Acts of the Saint (Marrassini 2003) recount that Gäbrä Mänfäs Qəddus moved to M.K. from his first seat on Mount ↗Zəqʷala, and dwelled there as a hermit for a longer period of time. Local traditions refer to numerous miracles worked by the Saint. He is said to have remained standing in M.K. for six months without any movement. During this ascetic exercise, the ↗Devil in the form of a raven is said to have pecked out his eye and blinded him. Only “90 years” later his eyesight was given back to him by the archangels Gäbrəʾel and Mikaʾel. After this miracle the Saint returned to Zəqʷala (Meinardus 1964: 36; Kriss – Kriss-Heinrich 1975: 11). The spiritual connection between M.K. and Zəqʷala is also reflected in an oral tradition claiming that once there was a secret underground passage between the two monasteries. The tradition of M.K. claims that Gäbrä Mänfäs Qəddus died and was buried there (Täsfa Gäbräyyäs 1994/95: 94).



Historical information on M.K. is meagre. The monastery was destroyed during the ğihād of ↗Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ġāzī but re-established by aṣe Gälawdewos (Täsfa Gäbräyyäs 1994/95: 94). Later, as a result of the 16th/17th-cent. Oromo migration, it may have been completely abandoned, but by 1908 it was rebuilt and re-established by aṣe Mənilək II (GueCopMen 524 and n. 2), and later became well known.

Today, the monastery of M.K. also includes a nunnery. It has two churches consecrated to Abbo (i.e. Gäbrä Mänfäs Qəddus) and Maryam.

Meron

M. (ሜሮን, Ar. mīrūn, from Gr. μύϱον, ‘perfumed oil’) corresponds to the Western holy chrism. In the Eastern Churches, it is made of balsam, olive oil and a variety of perfumes and cooked according to methods somewhat varying from one Church to the other (Mälkä Ṣedeq 1992: 101). In the Mäṣḥafä ↗ṭəmqät, it is referred to as fəlḥatä meron, ‘the coction of M.’. An expression of the apostolic tradition, M. is consecrated by a bishop (2nd Council of Carthage, 390, can. 3; ↗Kəhnät), together with the Galilaion at ↗baptism as an “oil of exorcism”, with which the priest ought to anoint “with the sign of the cross the heart, the chest, the hands inside and outside, the knees and all the parts of the body of those who will be baptized, saying: “NN …, I anoint you with the oil of gladness …’” (as in the Mäṣḥafä ↗krəstənna, cp. mss. Vat. aeth. 4, fol. 129rb [GreTisVat 60, 116f.]; BN d’Abbadie 213, fol. 66r [ChAbb 54f.]; not included in the printed liturgical editions since it has been inexistent, except in Eritrea, since 2004; Tgn. ቐሊላውን [Biğimi Zäʾabunä Bisoy 2004; Habtemichael Kidane 2008: 16]; Gr. ἔλαιον ἀγαλλιάσεως, originally καλλιέλαιος ‘cultivated olive’, s. Burmester 1945: 69). It has become the general custom in the East that the consecration of M. is done only when the need arises and normally during the Holy Week (↗Lent), and is the privilege of the patriarch surrounded by all its bishops (Villecourt 1923a; Youhanna Nessim Youssef – Zanetti 2013).

According to the Ethiopian tradition expressed in the commentary to the ↗Qəddase, the M. goes back to Jesus Christ himself. The apostles took pieces of the balsam tree which grew where his sweat had fallen during the Flight to Egypt and added them to the blood that came from Jesus’s hands and feet on Good Friday. The apostles took the mixture – which had the ability of boiling without fire when they prayed over it – to their respective regions of preaching (ed. Gärima Wäldä Kidan 1926: 117, no. 32). In the ↗Säqoqawä dəngəl, M. is identified directly with the sweat of the Child Jesus during the flight to Egypt (Hayoz 1956: 222, § xxxlii), which was mixed with balsam by the apostles to produce the ointment (cp. Zanetti 1993 and also Youhanna Nessim Youssef – Zanetti 2013: 12 and § 458).

The ↗Fətḥa nägäśt (ch. 3; Paulos Tzadua, 1968: 14) mentions neither chrismation nor M. (cp. Id. 1973, n. 124). The 16th-cent. Portuguese envoy ↗Alvares claimed that M. did not exist in Ethiopia (BeckHuntAlvar 109f.); ↗Ludolf, informed by abba ↗Gorgoryos, also denied its existence (LudHist 44).

Chrismation was described by ↗Täklä Maryam Sämharay (1931:35), who edited the initial rubric, writing: “The celebrant takes the holy chrism (which was only consecrated since the beginning of the baptismal rite)” and is, therefore, not actual chrism.

Reportedly, Ethiopia used to receive the M. from Jerusalem. It is also likely that Metropolitans used to bring some with them. In fact there is so far no reliable information beyond the claim of certain monastic churches (e.g., ↗Däbrä Wärq) to have held it for centuries. In reality, qəbʾa qəddus (‘holy ointment’) has been used up to the present day, the bishop or presbyter blessing imported olive oil as appropriate in the various services.

The first consecration of the M. in Ethiopia was done in Arabic by Coptic bishops before abunä ↗Basəlyos in 1959, in the crypt of the church of Qəddəst Maryam in Addis Abäba – the Mafəya meron, ‘the boiling place of the M.’. On 19–24 September 2004, M. was consecrated by Pope Shenouda III of Alexandria and abunä Ǝnṭonəs I, patriarch of Eritrea, in the church of ↗Ǝnda Maryam of Asmära, on which occasion the Galilaion was also blessed (Biğimi Zäʾabunä Bisoy 2004). Abunä P̣awlos I, patriarch of Ethiopia, consecrated M. on 12 July 2006 (5 Ḥamle, the feast of Peter and Paul; Asrat Gäbrämaryam 1998/99; Anon. 2006: 1–11); the M. was subsequently distributed to the archbishops (22 August) for them to take it to their parishes (Habtemichael Kidane 2008: 15f.; Fritsch 2009). This M. incorporated what remained from abunä Basəlyos’s M. used “as yeast” so that continuity is preserved. The Galilaion was not blessed and remains absent from Ethiopia.

M. is used to consecrate persons or things. Neophytes are anointed with M., thereby receiving chrismation (śərʿatä qəbʾatä meron, i.e. confirmation), now firmly considered one of the seven sacraments to be given immediately after Baptism (Mälkä Ṣedeq 1992: 100–04; s. also Mäṣḥafä krəstənna). Many priests used to use baptismal water with simple olive oil, or anointment by olive oil, for chrismation; the practice is diminishing since M. has become available. It is sometimes documented that those who receive the episcopal order (↗Kəhnät) “are ordained with Oil and inflation” (ዘይሠየሙ ፡ በቅብዓት ፡ ወበንፍሐት, s. Marqos 1942: 1). The anointment of kings – the last being aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase on 2 November 1930 – was also conducted with M., especially consecrated in Egypt in 1931 (Youhanna Nessim Youssef – Zanetti 2013, introduction, n. 209). Objects consecrated with M. include the baptismal (or ↗ṭəmqät celebration) water; the ↗tabot (Habtemichael Kidane 2008: 17f.); liturgical objects such as paten, chalice and communion-spoon (↗Qəddase: paraphernalia).

Migrations

II. Migrations after 1500 s. ↗Population history vol. 4

I. Migrations before 1400

M. have been frequent over the course of time in Ethiopia and Eritrea. The highlands have been especially subject to migration, from East, North, and South. M. before 1400, into, within, and to a minor extent, also from, Ethiopia, Eritrea and nearby regions, are attested by various evidence – from archaeology to linguistics, from written epigraphic and literary sources to oral traditions – and are largely used to explain the history of the earliest settlement in Ethiopia and Eritrea, the origin of the first historical Ethiopian civilization which emerged in the first millennium B.C. as documented by the earliest written evidence, as well as the ethnic situation which arose in the middle ages. An accurate investigation of place names has in not a few cases revealed the stratification and subsequent settlements of Ethiopian and Eritrean M. (↗Topography, historical, s. EAE vol. 5).

The distribution of strictly related Semitic languages on both sides of the ↗Red Sea actually is a phenomenon of major importance, to be explained by the presence of immigrants from South ↗Arabia who settled first in northern Ethiopia (as widely attested by the evidence of place names) probably even before the emergence of the monumental South Arabian civilization, between the first and the second millennium B.C. These immigrants brought with them their own South Semitic dialects. Besides this, Sabaean linguistic evidence and institutional, monumental, and religious features, including the establishment of a state institution itself, is positively attested by archaeology, epigraphy, onomastics, and points to more frequent and strict relations with Yemen, including also migration processes, with all probability through the present Eritrean coast, much more likely also through the southern coast beyond the ↗Bāb al-Mandab. It cannot be doubted that the ancestors of the ↗Sāho were among the first to be exposed to the South Arabian M., which, over a long period of time, crossed their territory, e.g., through the ↗Buri Peninsula to the highlands.

Considering the linguistic evidence – with all the limitations implied by the necessary distinction between language and ethnicity – the theory of a north-to-south movement direction for this migration is largely supported by parallel movements within the whole of the Semitic area (cp. Marrassini 2011), and the burden lies with those who deny this hypothesis by suggesting a migration movement of ↗Semitic speaking people in prehistoric times from south to north, i.e. from Ethiopia as the original cradle of ↗Afro-Asiatic, to the North (Egyptian, Berber, ↗Cushitic), West (Hausa), as well as East (Semitic), i.e. Arabia and beyond (e.g., Hudson 1977, 2000a, 2000b, 2002), while most Cushitic and Omotic speakers would have remained where they always were, i.e. within Ethiopia. The north-to-south movement, moreover, is later attested for Semitic speakers by linguistic evidence within the same Ethiopian area, with a continuous migration to the south of peoples whose original home was in the north, probably already in the ↗Aksumite period and certainly during its decline. Movements in the opposite direction – as the Ethiopian presence in South Arabia in the 3rd and then in the 6th cent. A.D. attests – seem to have been of a quite different character and only exceptionally must have given rise to stable settlements.

M. at a later period (after 3rd cent. A.D.) have been supposed to be linked to the fall of ↗Meroë and the possible role Aksum might have played in it, when early Nubians are supposed to have migrated from the 4th cent. A.D. on, actually the only hypothesis advanced to explain the "fall" of Meroë. Not much later is dated the migration of the ↗Beğa people. An episode of this early migration might be the deportation attested by the so-called pseudo-trilingual inscriptions of ↗ᶜEzana, for which also the place of destination, MḌ/Ματλια – probably to be identified with Dämba Məč̣č̣, in ↗Säraye (Rodinson 1981) – is known.

Numerically much less important migration has been hypothesized for the so-called "second Christianization" of Ethiopia at the turn of the 5th/early 6th cent. A.D. At the time groups of monks would have reached Ethiopia and Aksum, as refugees from the eastern provinces of the ↗Byzantine Empire as a consequence of doctrinal and theological debates, playing a pivotal role there in the development of monastic institutions. Although there is general agreement about their decisive cultural significance, the language and place of origin of these immigrants have been thoroughly debated in the last decades (Brita 2010).

M. of proto-islamic groups are recorded on the eve of ↗Islam (↗Hiğra). According to widely established traditions, the first emigration of Muslims left for Ethiopia in 615 A.D. and was given shelter by nägaš ↗Aṣḥama (↗Nağāšī). The Ethiopian righteous king not only saved Islam, but, according to Islamic sources, later in 628 A. D. personally accepted ↗Muḥammad's call and embraced Islam. Descent from ancestors belonging to this first migration are claimed, e.g., by the ↗Mänsaᶜ and by the ↗Marya. It is not clear to what extent any connection between these early immigrants and the earliest documented Islamic settlement in Ethiopia can be established.

M. from the Iranian (↗Iran, relations with Ethiopia) area (initially intended to balance growing Aksumite expansion) are hinted at by confused traditions about the Furs or 'Persians' (also mentioned in relation to the ↗Dahlak islands). These M. seem to have taken place over a long time span and encompass subsequent waves, from Sasanian Iran and, much later, the Persian Gulf and ↗Oman. The impact of these M. becomes definitely detectable, in terms of prosopography and literary and monumental evidence, from the 13th cent., when Iranian people and features are more clearly seen on the East African coast, from ↗Somalia to ↗Kenya, and all along the African coasts of the Indian Ocean. Along the same coasts, esp. on the Benaadir coastal area, the earliest Swahili settlements are believed to have been built around the 9th or 10th cent. From there Islamic urban civilization may have spread southwards to the rest of the East African coast. During the 12th cent., population pressure, continued Arab immigration, and possibly a series of droughts forced ↗Somali clans (e.g., the ↗Isaaq), to migrate to the Tana River region in Kenya and to the ↗Harär area in Ethiopia. In the wake of these M., two trade routes emerged: from ↗Zaylaᶜ to the ↗Šäwan highlands and from ↗Berbera to Harär via the ↗Ogaden. Similarly, by the 13th cent., Somali immigrants from the northern interior seem to have repeatedly overrun the coast, changing its character from Arab/Persian to Cushitic/Somali.

After the fall of Aksum, and as a possible active factor in that, Beğa groups – formerly subjected to forced dislocation southwards, to the inland Ethiopian highlands, as attested by the epigraphic Aksumite evidence – and known in the oral tradition as ↗Rom (s. EAE vol. 5; possibly a result of their identification with people coming from the Mediterranean "Rom", i.e. from the Byzantine Empire, or associated with them) or ↗Bäläw, migrated along the ↗Barka valley and settled in the Eritrean and Northern Ethiopian highlands coming from the north, partly also along the Red Sea coasts, around the 8th cent. A.D.

M. of people from the south around the 10th cent. is probably presupposed by the episode of the occupation and devastation of Aksum by queen Gʷədit (↗Ǝsato). South-to-north M. of ↗Agäw certainly started with the ↗Bilin (the so-called 'first Agäw migration'), moving from ↗Lasta, that according to their traditions is considered their place of origin. This first wave of Agäw immigrants must have taken place probably around the 10th cent. A.D. as well, or a bit earlier. Similar M. also affected people later settled in ↗Ǝggäla. Further waves of Agäw-speaking immigrants (the "second Agäw migration") reached the northern highlands around the 13th/14th cent. A.D. Most of these were semitized in the course of time (e.g., the ↗Adkämä Məlgaᵓ, in the central ↗Ḥamasen and Säraye regions) and replaced in turn the Rom/Bäläw.

The spreading of the Christian faith from the established religious centres in the north towards the southern regions, under the impulse of renewed monastic movements and the territorial expansion pursued by aṣe ↗ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon in the 14th cent., also determined M. of religious groups of monks (the migration of an individual or of a group also being a hagiographical tópos), but also of troops who probably established military colonies. It is not to be excluded that the ethnogenesis of some of the ↗Gurage people (e.g., ↗Gogot, ↗Mäsqän, ↗Ǝndägäñ, from ↗Guraᶜ, etc.), nor that a first wave of migration is in fact to be related to this event, as oral traditions also report. Other M. concern, e.g., people who settled in ↗Wäğğärat moving from the ᶜAfär plain and from Ǝndärta, ↗Ǝnda Mäkwännən, Bora, ↗Säläwa, ↗Säqota, ↗Gayənt, ↗Sayənt and ↗ᶜAddi Q̱äyyəḥ.

M. have also been invoked in relation to the question of the ethnogenesis of the Fälaša (↗Betä Ǝsraᵓel; an initial migration from the Hebrew colony of Elephantine in the 7th/5th cent. B.C. has been hypothesized). Much more certain is the fact that not later than the 14th cent., under increasing pressure to convert and conform, the Fälaša might have migrated to less-valued inhospitable regions, where the competition for land was reduced and royal control minimized.

M. and merging of populations coming from different places – Arab immigrants arriving between the 9th and 12th cent. and local residents, as well as alter strategic inter-ethnic marital alliances at the time of the arrival of the ↗Oromo in the 16th cent. – is probably also at the origin of the ethnogenesis of the ↗Harari, as the historical literature suggests.

Mikaᵓel Ǝmməru

Ləǧ M.Ǝ. (ሚካኤል ፡ እምሩ; b. 1926, or 1929, Addis Abäba, d. 27 October 2008, Addis Abäba), was a diplomat and politician of aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I's era and the Prime Minister of Ethiopia during the last days of the Empire.

M.Ǝ. was the son of ras ↗Ǝmməru Ḫaylä Śəllase, thus, a descendant of nəguś ↗Śahlä Śəllase, and wäyzäro Ṣəge Maryam.

M.Ǝ. spent the Italian occupation with his family in Jerusalem. After Liberation he attended Ḫaylä Śəllase I Secondary School and later studied at Oxford University where he graduated in Economics, Political Science and Philosophy.

M.Ǝ., as his father, was known for being a liberal aristocrat who favoured social reform. As a sign of his radicalism he wore his hair in the style of Emperor ↗Tewodros II (Greenfield 1967: 385). Moreover, he was known for distributing his land to the farmers.

In 1957 M.Ǝ. took the position of administrator of the Planning Board, which he held until 1959. In 1958 he was also nominated Vice-Minister of Agriculture, a position he held until 1959, when he represented Ethiopia as ambassador to the ↗United States. In 1961, for only two months, he held the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs, but was relieved of this office and sent on another diplomatic mission to Moscow (↗Russia, relations with) where he stayed until 1965. In 1965 M.Ǝ. represented Ethiopia at the UNESCO Conference on Trade and Development in Geneva. He returned to Ethiopia after he had been nominated Prime Minister on 22 July 1974, to replace ↗Mäkʷännən Ǝndalkaččäw. His nomination was meant to serve as a sign of the Därg's (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council) will to cooperate with the Emperor and to maintain continuity. M.Ǝ. arrived from Geneva on 25 July and was met at the airport by ↗Aman Mikaᵓel Andom. He held the office of Prime Minister until 12 September of the same year. M.Ǝ. was among those who accompanied Ḫaylä Śəllase when he was deposed.

M.Ǝ. continued his political activity after the ↗Revolution of 1974 and served as Minister of Information. In his later career he worked for the World Bank. He also actively fought for the return of cultural objects, taken out of the country during the Italian occupation.

M.Ǝ. is buried in the Qəddəst Śəllase Cathedral in Addis Abäba.

Military units and organization

I. Aksumite army s. ↗Army: Army of the Aksumites

II. Military units and organization until the 19th cent.

III. Military units and organization in the 19th and 20th cents.

II. Military units and organization until the 19th cent.

In the Christian army as known from late medieval times, there were four kinds of troops: 1) regular troops of the Emperor; 2) regular troops of individual military leaders; 3) specially mobilized territorial troops; 4) irregular troops. The traditional military units were the ↗č̣äwa, grouped according to areas and clans (CRHist 113 [text]). Units or whole armies were also called ሰራዊት, särawit, ሐራ, ḥara ('army') and ጭፍራ, č̣əfra ('body of troops'). The ↗nəguś was often involved in ↗warfare, while typical commanders of units were the ↗azmač, ↗däǧǧazmač, ↗ras, ↗fitawrari, ↗balambaras, ↗azzaž and ↗bašša. The number of men commanded by each type of officer varied. Typically, though a ras was the one commanding larger armies (up to 40,000), the däǧǧazmač or fitawrari commanded mid-size corps (up to 10,000 men) and the other officers smaller bodies of men (2,000 to 5,000) (Pankhurst 1963: 118).

Historically, during major expeditions, a substantial part of the Christian army consisted of local units, a fact that provoked constant tension between central and regional forces. The religious-ethnic composition of the units was mixed. A large part might have been Təgrəñña- and Amhara-speaking Christians, but other religious and/or ethnic groups were also active. Muslim, Fälaša (↗Betä Ǝsraᵓel) and other populations (such as ↗"Barya" i.e. ↗Nara, ↗Damot, ↗Hadiyya, ↗Kayla, ↗Oromo) subdued by the Christian state contributed considerable numbers of men to the central army. ↗Yəkunno Amlak's huge army, for instance, probably included a large number of Muslims (TadTChurch 91f., 126).

During the reign of aṣe ↗ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon I, when such units are first reported, the emperor carried out a major reorganization and upgrading of the royal army. Thus the balance of power swung in favour of the Christian emperor; a situation that remained unchanged for over 200 years (TadTChurch 90). Three different types of units are recorded in the chronicle of ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon: 1) territorial forces named after the provinces in which they were recruited; 2) probably elite contingents with prestigious names asserting their military strength; 3) corps distinguished by the weapons or equipment they carried (↗spears; ↗swords and knives).

ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon's specifically territorial units came from a number of towns, provinces and regions: ↗Amhara, ↗Šäwa, ↗Goǧǧam, Damot, Hadiyya, Säqält, Gondär, Ḥarb Gʷända (probably ↗Gafat) and Nara. Some of them were ↗cavalry units, divided into two parts – those "of the right" (ግራ, gra) and those "of the left" (ቀኝ, qäññ) (cf. PerrAmdS 293, 382f., 399; MarAmdS index).

Units known by prestigious titles might have corresponded to elite troops used as a strike force and closely attached to the royal court, some of them being split into smaller units. Each unit was headed by an officer directly responsible to the king, often from among his intimate friends and relatives (TadTChurch 90, 94). Such units included the ተኵላ (Täkʷəla, 'Jackal'), a name that, according to the Chronicle of ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon, suggests its particular strength; the ቀስተ ፡ ንህብ (Qästä nəhəb, lit. 'bow of a bee'), and the ኮረም (Koräm, 'Cavalry'; arranged as mentioned in MarAmdS 63, 65, 113, 115).

Units known by their equipment or arms included the ጸዋርያነ ፡ ወርመት (Ṣäwarəyanä wärmät, probably 'carriers of spear(s)'); the ጸዋርያነ ፡ ወርመት ፡ ዐቢያን (Ṣäwarəyanä wärmät ᶜabbiyan, probably 'carriers of large spears'); the ጸዋርያነ ፡ አሳይፍት (Ṣäwarəyanä asayəft, lit. 'carriers of swords'); ጸዋርያነ ፡ ነረንጋሬ (Ṣäwarəyanä närängare), the ሰራዊት ፡ እለ ፡ ይጸውሩ ፡ ወልታ (Särawit əllä yəṣäwwəru wälta, 'troops which carry shield(s)'); the ጸዋርያነ ፡ መንበር (Ṣäwarəyanä mänbär, lit. 'carriers of the throne'); and the ጸዋርያነ ፡ መነስንስት (Ṣäwarəyanä mänäsnəst, probably 'carriers of fly-whisks') (s. PerrAmdS 382f.). Many of these warriors, mainly ↗infantry, are described here as highly skilled in using the bow, javelin, fighting like eagles, and running like wild goats; the movement of their feet is likened to the rolling of stones, and the noise they made to the roaring of the sea (MarAmdS 11; HuntAmdS 81f.).

Regiments and units in the armies of subsequent emperors followed similar patterns. A few unit names were used under several emperors, whilst others were possibly not resumed after the ruler's death. Names found in the Chronicle of aṣe ↗Zärᵓa Yaᶜəqob are clearly metaphors of power: በድል ፡ መስቀል (Bädəl mäsqäl, lit. 'through the victory of the Cross'), በድል ፡ መብረቅ (Bädəl mäbräq, lit. 'through the victory of lightning'), በድል ፡ ደመና (Bädəl dämäna, lit. 'through the victory of a cloud'), በድል ፡ ሾተል (Bädəl šotäl, lit. 'through the victory of a dagger'), or በድል ፡ ድብ (Bädəl dəbb, lit. 'through the victory of a bear'). Others seem to incorporate geographical allusions, such as በአደል ፡ አምባ (Bäᵓadäl amba, lit. 'through Adäl mountain'), or ደመና ፡ አደል (Dämäna adäl, lit. 'cloud of Adäl') (PerrZarY 31, 35, 45). Another important unit was the ↗Ǧan Amora, or 'royal eagle', which also appears under aṣe ↗Bäᵓədä Maryam (PerrZarY 143; for the use of animal names in military context, cp. Drewes 1998 and Conti Rossini 1910).

The military drew its economic support from the peasantry. As studied by Taddesse Tamrat, two systems seem to have been prevalent, at least since the time of ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon I. During campaigns armies collected their provisions from the country through which they happened to march. However, when an effective and a more permanent occupation was intended the same arrangement was simply extended far and wide, and the occupied land was divided into a number of ↗gʷəlt each assigned for the maintenance of an officer and his dependants. The gʷəlt thus provided the means of maintaining a large territorial army and it simplified the task of governing the expanding state by dividing it into small, easily manageable units (TadTChurch 98, 101, 102 n. 2).

Towards 1529, ᶜArabfaqīh in the ↗Futūḥ al-Ḥabaša describes the Christian army of aṣe ↗Ləbnä Dəngəl as being "as numerous as locusts" (at one point about 16,000 cavalry and 200,000 infantry), and composed of men from ↗Təgray, ↗Agäw, Goǧǧam, ↗Bägemdər, ↗Angot, Qəda and ↗Gäñ (BassHist 34, 55f. [text]).

Under aṣe ↗Gälawdewos, a remarkable military innovation took place which involved integrating a company of foreign soldiers into his army, mostly Portuguese (↗Portugal), who had arrived in Ethiopia with Christovão da ↗Gama. With their arrival, ↗fire-arms and artillery were used for the first time on a large scale by the Christian army (cp. BeckHuntAlvar 516). The Portuguese also introduced modern European infantry tactics. A few of them (in ca. 1625 such company numbered 40 men; BecRASO VII, 42) served well into the reign of aṣe ↗Fasilädäs (cf. Martínez 2011).

In the army of aṣe ↗Śärṣ́ä Dəngəl, a number of units were known to be active. The ↗Zenahu lägalla tells of the continued existence of the ᶜ*Adäl Mäbräq* and the Ǧan Amora (BeckHuntAlm 115f.; SDHist 225 [text]). Elite units bore protective or evocative names: ሥሉስ ፡ ኀይሌ (Śəllus ḫayle, 'The Trinity is my force'), በድል ፡ ፀሓይ (Bädəl ṣ́äḥay, 'through the victory of the sun'), ጊዮርጊስ ፡ ኀይሌ (Giyorgis ḫayle, 'Giyorgis is my strength). The latter were once involved in an act of insubordination when they raided the ↗kätäma of Śärṣ́ä Dəngəl and pillaged the tents of ətege ↗Säblä Wängel (CRHist 27 [text]). Other units from the army of the same king were: አቄት ፡ ዠር (Aqet žär, 'mason', cp. ↗Aqetzär), አረጓ ፡ ጨዋ (Arägʷa č̣äwa), መሪር (Märir), ግርሜ (Gərme, perhaps from gərma, 'Glory'?), ቍርባን (Qʷərban 'Eucharistic offering'), including cavalry and riflemen, ወድ ፡ ኀዳር (Wäd ḫədar, also wäd ḫadär; cp. Amh. Wättaddär 'soldier') as well as ጋላ (Galla, i.e. Oromo) companies. Units of riflemen – of Portuguese but also of Turkish origin (ትርኵ, Tərkʷ, 'the Turks', ↗Mäläsay) were used successfully to storm difficult positions. Among the latter were the ናር (Nar, cp. Arab. nar 'fire'), and perhaps the ትሙር (Təmur) and ኤርማግ (Ermag; CRHist 5, 30, 36, 38ff., 89, 114, 128 [text], 185 [tr.]; PerChron vol. 1, 90f. [text], vol. 2, 342). Slave troops were referred to as አግብርት (Agbərt, 'slaves') .

During the succession wars at the turn of the 16th cent., the Qʷərban corps was especially active and influential (e.g., PerChron vol. 1, 10, 41, 52–56, 85 [text]).

In 1604, aṣe ↗Zädəngəl, fearing the power of his rival aṣe ↗Susənyos, made an extraordinary levy and formed what appears to have been an enormous corps called መለክ ፡ ሐራ (Mäläk ḥara 'Royal Army'; PerChron vol. 1, 51 [text]), which reappeared under Susənyos (ibid. 324 [text]). The Aqetžär were also active around 1604 (ibid. 70 [text]).

An important innovation at this time was the incorporation of Oromo units in the Christian armies. Aṣe ↗Yaᶜəqob had such units at his disposal, but it was Susənyos who used them more effectively. Units of ↗Tuulama, "Bartuma" (↗Baarentuu), ↗Mäč̣č̣a, "Borän" and Liiban (↗Boorana), were sporadically active on Susənyos's side during his years as a šəfta (PerChron vol. 1, 38, 42, 46, 57, 112 [text]). Various corps of የሀበታ (Yähabäta), horsemen and fighters, having lived among the Mäč̣č̣a (cf. MHasOr 69), were also active in the Christian army. They were divided into tribes: ጭሌሃ ፡ ኦቦ (Č̣əlleha obo), ጭሌሃ ፡ ጋላን (Č̣əlleha galan), ጃዊ (Ǧawi), ሆኮ (Hoko) (PerChron vol. 1, 148–51, 260 [text]; BecRASO XII, 488; cp. PerChron vol. 2, 538f.).

Under Susənyos's rule old units also reappeared, such as the Giyorgis ḫayle, who were amongst those proclaiming him Emperor in 1604. Among his elite units the [ሐራ] ኮከብ (Ḥara Kokäb, 'army of star') and the Henok (ሄኖክ) stood out. The former was said to comprise about 1,000 horsemen under imperial command; they were reported to be "among the oldest and best soldiery in Ethiopia", and "accustomed to fighting and skilled in combat" (BecRASO VII, 26; PerChron vol. 1, 170, 295 [text], vol. 2, 459; BecRASO XII, 371). The Henok, referred to in Jesuit sources as "Enaceeis", and commanded by ras ↗Śəᶜəlä Krəstos, was described as a well-trained Catholic company with more than 2,000 soldiers, mostly cavalry (BecRASO VII, 113; XII, 489). A third elite unit could have been the ጨረቃ (Č̣äräqa, 'Moon'), who carried a white shield with the shape of the moon. About 1631, they defected from the Emperor and joined rebel forces in Lasta (BecRASO VII, 159).

Among the units of other lords, ↗Fasilädäs was once at the head of the Kayla and ↗Maya companies (PerChron vol. 1, 307f. [text]; BecRASO VII, 159). ↗Goǧǧam nägaš ↗Kəflo commanded a ኀይላት (Ḫaylat; Guidi 1940: 6) unit from Goǧǧam and another, the ማርያም ፡ ኀይሌ (Maryam ḫayle, 'Mary is my force') from Amhara (PerChron vol. 1, 119, 176, 254 [text]).

Owing to the religious wars ravaging the country in the 1620s and early 1630s, the names of a few anti-Catholic units are also reported in European sources: in Təgray a unit of Č̣äräqa and ሥልጣን ፡ ክርስቶስ (Śəlṭan Krəstos, 'Power of Christ'; BecRASO VII, 27); and in Šäwa and Amhara units guided by Orthodox priests and monks were called "Dioscorite" and "Jacobite souls" (Roiz, 13 February 1625, 228r; Paes, 15 June 1625, 236r, 240r; BecRASO VI, 386, 394).

Military organization is seldom described in Ethiopian sources. Throughout most of the period surveyed the greater part of the soldiery was not considered distinct from the general population and a regular payment system was unknown until the 19th cent. (Pankhurst 1963: 118f., 128f.). Additionally, the size of the units varied, though evidence from Susənyos's times indicates that a normal unit had around 500 men (BecRASO VII, 26, 42). In a campaign of 1629, the Emperor led an army of 20,000 infantry and 2,000 cavalry who were divided into 40 squadrons or companies; the army was also followed by a retinue, composed mostly of family members, servants and slaves, of about 80,000 (BecRASO VII, 41f.).

Units could be specialized or mixed, for instance including archers and cavalry. In the early Gondärine period the title of ↗šaläqa first appears in the historical record; theoretically the šaläqa was the head of a thousand men, but usually of a regiment of a few hundred (though with several inaccuracies, cf. Tsegaye Tegenu 1996: 69f.).

As for training, only elite troops under the emperor or prominent local lords appear to have been put through regular exercises. From the time of Ləbnä Dəngəl, there is evidence of regular training manoeuvres practiced at the kätäma in the presence of the ruler (Alvares 1989: 246; cp. Castanhoso 1898, ch. 7).

Susənyos, seldom defeated in battle, seems to have benefited markedly from adopting Oromo tactics (PerChron vol. 1, 91 [text]), and at least one of his best commanders, däggač ↗Bukko, trained his army using Portuguese infantry tactics (cp. BecRASO VI, 429 and Castanhoso 1898, ch. 6). Battle was joined by playing the dəbb anbäsa (a special kind of nägarit drum), and nəsər qana (type of flute or trumpet; e.g., PerChron vol. 1, 117). Tactics were reportedly simple, consisting of massed frontal attacks by an advanced guard as well as guerrilla warfare (PerGov 167; cf. also AbbSéjour vol. 1, 302ff., 311ff.).

By the late 18th cent., the emperor's "household troops" were said by Bruce to consist of 8,000 infantry men, 2,000 of them with fire-arms. They were divided into four companies, each known as ቤት (bet 'house'), for which he provides the names of three, namely the Anbäsa ('↗Lions'), Ǧan (cp. Ǧan Amora, ↗ Ǧan Bädəl; ↗elephants) and Wärq (↗Gold). He also informs us that companies each bore their own distinctive standard (BruNile III, 309ff.).

III. Military units and organization in the 19th and 20th cents.

During the 40 years from the coronation of aṣe ↗Tewodros II as Emperor in 1855 to the rise of aṣe ↗Mənilək II little progress was made in modernizing the military forces of Ethiopia. They remained highly fragmented, with standing forces under the command of the Emperor alongside those of semi-autonomous provincial governors. In times of war, peasant levies were called up, and the provincial governors placed their armies as auxiliary forces under imperial command.

At the peak of his power, Tewodros commandeered an army of 150,000. Mənilək II went into the battle of ↗ᶜAdwa with a force of 75,000–100,000 (Pankhurst 1963:127f.). In the early 20th cent., the total number of military was about 200,000 of which only 15,000 were the standing army of the emperor, the remainder being dispersed in the country under the command of provincial lords and military governors. The 7,000-strong Royal bodyguard, the የልፍኝ ፡ ዘበኛ, Yälfəñ zäbäñña, was the core of Mənilək's permanent army. In the early 1930s, the Central army (መሐል ፡ ሰፋሪ, Mäḥal säfari), under the command of the Minister of War, counted about 16,000, the ↗Imperial bodyguard (IBG) about 5,000 (both stationed in Addis Abäba), and ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I's personal army in Harär, around 10,000. To face the Italian invasion, Ḫaylä Śəllase mobilized around 360,000 soldiers out of a population estimated to be 8 million.

Traditionally, Ethiopian emperors understood military modernization mainly as the acquisition of more and better ↗fire-arms and cannons. Tewodros was the first to attempt to modernise military organization and training, but his reforms did not survive his fall. Thus he was a pioneer in trying to establish a regular army with a single national ethos and in establishing regular payment system in money for his soldiers (Pankhurst 1963:119). ↗Yoḥannəs IV hired the Scot ↗Kirkham to train 12,000 soldiers (Pankhurst 1963:120). Mənilək II also engaged foreigners to train his military. By 1903, at least seven Russian officers (↗Russia, relations with) were training soldiers of the Ethiopian army. Ras ↗Mäkʷännən Wäldä Mikaʾel also initiated modest military innovations among his forces.

After the appointment of ras Täfäri, the son of ras Mäkʷännən, as regent in 1916, military reforms greatly accelerated (cf. Tsegaye Tegenu 1996:45). The first modern military unit was the ማለፊያ ፡ ብረት ፡ ያዥ (Maläfiya bərät yaž, 'Better Armed Unit') later renamed መትረየስ ፡ ዘበኛ (Mäträyäs zäbäñña, 'Machine-gun Guards'), trained by Russian émigré officers. It formed the core of the new Royal bodyguard directly answerable to the Regent, and which became the IBG in 1928. As it grew in numbers, it was divided into branches: infantry, artillery, cavalry and band units. In 1929, an air section was added (↗Air force). On the eve of the Italian invasion in 1935, the 5,000 IBG soldiers were organized in one regiment subdivided into four battalions and three artillery units.

In 1928, Regent ras Täfäri began to send Ethiopians abroad for military training: a dozen went to the French St. Cyr Military Academy. In 1929, he contracted 12 Belgian officers, six of whom were assigned to the IBG. In 1931, Swiss and again Belgian officers were recruited to train his personal army stationed at Harär. In 1934, with the help of Swedish advisors (↗Sweden, relations with), the ↗Holäta Military Academy was established. Military training was based upon the French system.

The Italian invasion and occupation of Ethiopia (↗Italian war 1935-36; ↗Africa Orientale Italiana) largely destroyed the traditional military system. On re-entering Addis Abäba in 1941, Ḫaylä Śəllase I was determined never again to allow regional governors to wield military power or external forces to attack Ethiopia. In pursuing this goal he relied extensively on foreign military assistance to create a centralized modern professional army under his tight control.

Reflecting traditional – and often justified – mistrust of the political class in Ethiopia of foreigners and their political and other intentions, Ḫaylä Śəllase I tried to diversify as much as possible the sources of assistance in order to avoid relying on a single source, which could negatively impact Ethiopia's sovereignty. Until 1953, the British were the "lead agency" in military assistance, with Sweden as a distant second. After liberation, under the British-Ethiopian Agreement of 1942, the British assisted Ethiopia in raising, organizing and training the new Imperial Ethiopian Army (IEA). It counted ten infantry battalions, a regiment of pack artillery, armoured car and engineer and signal services were added later. The IEA was stationed in Addis Abäba and at key points in Ṭəgray, Bägemdər, Goǧǧam, Harär, Sidamo and Ǧimma. The British also assisted in revitalising the Imperial Military Academy at Holäta.

After 1953, the ↗United States of America rapidly became the most important source of military aid. In the 1950s ↗Norway, and ↗India also began to provide military aid, and in the 1960s ↗Israel became the second most important provider of military assistance.

To counterbalance the IEA, Ḫaylä Śəllase I reconstituted the IBG with 500 men arranged in three companies. By 1945, it had grown into seven battalions, five stationed in Addis Abäba and one each in Goǧǧam and Harär. In 1946, an IBG cadet school with Swedish instructors was opened at Qäbäna, in Addis Abäba. The cadets were recruited from the best students of grade four and above. The IBG rapidly became the elite military institution of Ethiopia, and received better training and equipment than regular ground forces.

In 1942, a third army called ነጭ ፡ ለባሽ (Näč̣č̣ läbaš, lit. 'wearing white', i.e. 'plainclothes, irregular soldiers'), was set up, whose members were drawn from the Patriots (↗Resistance), to prevent them from turning to banditry. It was a militia type of force to be used as a supplementary rural police force. In 1944, the Ethiopian ↗Air Force Pilot School was set up, with Swedish support, in Addis Abäba. In 1945, it was transferred to ↗Däbrä Zäyt. Sweden also provided the planes for the fledgling air force, and a Swedish officer commanded it until 1962, when an Ethiopian officer took over.

Ḫaylä Śəllase also initiated modern Ethiopian arms production. In 1951, the first Ethiopian ammunition factory was established, with support from Czechoslovakia, other military ordnance factories followed in the late 1950s.

In 1951, Ethiopia seconded troops to the UN forces dispatched to Korea. Drawn from the IBG, a battalion of the ↗Qaññäw Force was attached to the US 7th Division. Every year a new battalion was sent to Korea. All in all, about 5,000 IBG soldiers served in Korea.

In 1953 the USA and Ethiopia concluded a Mutual Defence Assistance Agreement (MDAA). In return for a 25-year lease on the Qaññäw Communication Centre near Asmära, the USA were to assist Ethiopia in modernizing and expanding her armed forces. As part of the implementation of this scheme, in 1955 the IEA was reorganized into the Ethiopian Ground Forces (EGF). Until 1960, its three divisions stationed in Addis Abäba, Təgray/Eritrea and Harär, were kept at an operational strength of 6,000 men each. In 1960, the USA agreed to increase the EGF-divisions to 8,000 men each, to establish a new fourth division headquartered at Addis Abäba, and to provide support for the Ethiopian Air Force, Marines and Police.

In 1958 the Näč̣č̣ Läbaš were transformed into the Imperial Territorial Army (ITA), i.e. a reserve army stationed in the provinces under the command of provincial governors. It was to assist the regular police force in maintaining public order and to reinforce the regular armed forces in times of war.

From the early 1960s, Israel provided training and equipment for commando units, paratroops, and military intelligence. Under Arabic diplomatic pressure, Ethiopia broke diplomatic relations with Israel after the 1973 October War, but Israel quietly continued to provide military aid.

Until 1958, officers of the EGF were trained abroad or at the Holäta Academy, which conferred commissions as second lieutenants. The Holäta cadets, lacking secondary-level education, were non-commissioned officers (NCO's). In May 1958, the ↗Harär Military Academy was established. Until 1966, India supplied the funds, the Commander of the Academy and the bulk of the instructors. Graduates received diplomas and commissions as second lieutenants, and were eligible to receive the equivalent of a bachelor's degree on completion of one year of additional study at university level. The Harär Military Academy rapidly developed into an elite institution whose graduates were perceived, and saw themselves, as belonging to a military aristocracy expected to monopolize high ranking positions in the army.

Under the MDAA, nearly 23,000 Ethiopian servicemen took advanced training courses within the framework of military education programs, 4,000 of them at facilities in the USA. The total value of military and economic aid provided by the USA to Ethiopia under the MDAA amounted to US-$ 606 million.

The widespread feeling within the officer corps of the IBG of being not only the military, but also a national elite, rapidly led to the emergence of political ambition, which culminated in the ↗Coup d'état 1960 (s. EAE vol. 2, 1081–82). It failed because the regular army, more traditional, deeply resentful of the privileged position of the IBG, and antagonized by the elitist attitudes of the IBG officers and the air force, remained loyal to the Emperor. After the failed coup, the IBG was not disbanded, but it lost its privileged position. Most senior officers were executed, imprisoned or expelled, while loyal officers mainly from the EGF filled the vacancies. Under the new commanders, until the fall of the monarchy, the 10,000-strong IBG remained an elite corps, protecting the Emperor and exerting control over the regular army. In recognition of their demonstrated loyalty, the EGF were granted a much larger share of military expenditure, and rapidly outgrew the IBG in size and quality of their equipment.

The 1960s also saw a rapid expansion of the Air Force. A pilot school was set up within the Air Force Academy, which also included schools for technical staff (aircraft maintenance, electronics technicians, communications operators, weapons specialists). In 1960, the first paratrooper units were established.

Under an agreement signed in 1954, Norwegian naval officers organized and trained a modest maritime force. In 1955, the Naval College near Massawa was created; in 1958, the Imperial Ethiopian ↗Navy (IEN) was officially established. Until 1974, a small contingent of retired British naval personnel was employed in executive positions as advisers and training supervisors.

In the early 1970s, the Imperial government realized that its Armed Forces, then about 40,000 strong, would not be sufficient to deal simultaneously with the war in Eritrea and a possible war with Somalia. Therefore, in 1973, general national service was introduced. It was to start in 1974 but before the first round of conscripts could be called up, the Ethiopian ↗Revolution began in February 1974, and these plans were shelved.

With the help of the USA and other Western countries, Ḫaylä Śəllase I had, within two decades, succeeded in providing Ethiopia with a well organized and functionally differentiated modern military, one of the strongest in sub-Saharan Africa. Within the Ethiopian system of rule, the new Ethiopian military represented a modernized version of the old Palace army, and its establishment still exhibited many traditional military features. Reflecting the old imperial policy of divide and rule, the four services of the Ethiopian military (IBG, EGF, IEAF, and IEN) did not have a unified supreme command, but remained separated from each other. Supreme Commander of all four was the emperor. Within the four services, elaborate internal control and security systems were installed to prevent the emergence of co-ordinated opposition from the military. There existed a deep divide between the privileged officer corps and the underpaid ill-treated rank and file soldiers. The officer corps was riven by deep cleavages based on seniority, social background, and training. Especially bitter was the rivalry between the graduates from Holäta and those from Harär, the Naval College and the Air Force Academy.

During the Därg regime (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council) the military took a preeminent role in social and political life. Most of the leading politicians of the regime came from the lower and middle ranks of the army, beginning with Mängəśtu Ḫaylä Maryam himself, who was a Major (cf. also Ottaway – Ottaway 1978: 131f.). One major innovation of the regime was the formation of militias by the qäbäle and peasant associations. With the National Military Service Proclamation of 1983 the military government emphasized extension of military institutions to the society at large thus blending military and development campaigns. With this proclamation all Ethiopian citizens aged 18 to 50 were rendered liable to military service for terms of up to 24 months. About the same time the National Defence and Security Council was also established, a high-level organ designed to oversee matters of defence and security and also to deal with natural disasters (Harbeson 1988: 184f.; Keller 1988: 234).

During the Därg military expenditure increased considerably together with the size and strength of the army. Defence expenditures grew more than tenfold between 1974 and 1982 to US-$ 381 million; in 1976–77 the estimated defence budget had further grown to US-$ 446.86 million, reaching 8.2 % of the Gross Domestic Product. Similarly, for the period from 1976–77 to 1987–88 the army's strength had increased sixfold, from 47,000 to 313,000. Throughout the whole period the role of foreigners as advisers and support troops was also important, in particular from the Soviet Union, Cuba and Eastern Europe. From 1978 to 1985 about 12.000 Cuban combat troops supported the Ethiopian army. In 1987–88 foreign advisors and support staff still numbered about 5,000 (Patman 1990: 182f., 260f.;Korn 1986: 91; Keller 1988: 211f., 267f.).

Mogadishu

M. (Somali sp.: Muqdisho; 2°4'0"N, 45°22'0"E) is an ancient city and is the present-day capital of ↗Somalia, with a population of about one million (for location s. map for Luuq). The folk etymology of the name connects M. with the Arabic Maqᶜad Šāh (Arab., 'seat of the Shah') and hints at the possibility of a Persian role in the founding of the city. The derivation of M. from the Swahili mui wa mwisho ('end town, or last city') is also not completely satisfying. The Somali name Ḥamar (Xamar) refers more properly to the quarters of 'old Mogadishu' (Xamar weyn and Xamar jabjab) but can be used as a metonym for the whole city.

The precise date of the foundation of M. cannot be established: as a matter of fact, the ↗Periplus Maris Erythraei contains no reference to M., and the town is first mentioned (under the name Maqdašu) in Yāqūt's Muᶜǧam al-buldān completed in 1228 (Yāqūt 1989: 173).

Some disputed traditions date the founding of M. back to the 5th Caliph of the Umayyad dynasty, ᶜAbdalmalik b. Marwān (d. 705; s. ᶜAydarus 1955: 36–41; Freeman – Grenville 1966: 241f.), or to the period between 935 and 949 when a group of seven brothers, fleeing religious persecution, left the Persian Gulf area and eventually settled on the East African coast (Barros 1552, Dec. I, Liv. VIII, Cap. VI: 97v–98r summarizing a version of the Chronicle of Kilwa).

However, the general historical background of the origins of M. is relatively sure (Gori 2006: 30–35, 71–74; Chittick 1982; Cuoq 1981: 64–5). A remarkable amount of local historical notes, genealogies and funerary inscriptions (the oldest of which dates to 1217) discovered and published by Cerulli (1926–28; 1927) give us more sound and reliable data. These Somali Arabic sources clearly point to the fact that immigrants from the Persian Gulf (Naysābūr, Šīrāz) and the Arabian peninsula (Ḥaḍramawt, Medina) began to settle in M. in 766/7 when Ismāᶜīl b. ᶜUmar of the Arab Banū ᶜAffān clan arrived in town (Cerulli 1927: 392). The Kitāb al-zunūǧ (CerSom I, 232) seems to confirm this date indirectly as it mentions the arrival in M. of a messenger of the Abbasid ḫalīfa sent in 766/67 to check the loyalty of the local population to the Baghdad dynasty.

The different families of Arab (and possibly Persian) ancestry (39 clans belonging to five main groups: ᶜAqabī, ᶜAfīfī, Ǧidᶜatī, Ismāᶜīlī and Qaḥṭānī/Muqrī) in M. created a kind of federal administration in which the council of the leaders (↗šayḫ) of the groups (ṭāʾifa, according to the terminology used by Yāqūt 1989: 173) ruled the town as a "republic" (Fiaccadori 1989). The "republican" regime in M. came to an end in the first half of the 13th cent. when, under unclear circumstances, a hereditary sultanate was established by Abū Bakr b. Faḫraddīn with the support of the Muqrīs who, in return, were given the office of qāḍī (Cerulli 1926: 18).

The first detailed description of M. is found in the eyewitness account of ↗Ibn Baṭṭūṭa, who visited the city in 1331 (Defremery-Sanguinetti 1969: 180–91; Gibb 1962: 373–79). The Moroccan traveller found M. under the rule of the sulṭān Abū Bakr b. ᶜUmar a "Barābir" (i.e. Somali, cp. ↗Berbera) who was simply called "šayḫ" by his subjects.

Ibn Baṭṭūṭa's detailed and vivid report describes a flourishing M., an "exceedingly large city" inhabited by rich merchants and characterized by brisk economic and social activity. The report mentions, in particular, that the city exported "incomparable cloths" to ↗Egypt and other countries (s. Laitin – Samatar 1987: 15), probably referring to the brilliant red-and-white-coloured fabric of the Benadiri artisans and weavers. The political and religious life was also highly developed: every Saturday, M.'s qāḍī (a judge of Egyptian origin), the descendants of the Prophet, the pilgrims to Mecca, the law experts, the emirs, the ministers and the high officials of the army gathered in the palace of the šayḫ to greet him and share lunch with him. After the banquet, the qāḍī, the emirs and the ministers administered justice among petitioners and solicitants. A town ǧāmiᶜ mosque was also available for the communal Friday prayer, to which the šayḫ also attended personally. The fame of M. was so widespread that the name of the town came to be mentioned as Mäqduš in the Mäṣḥafä ↗Milad of aṣe Zärʾa Yaᶜəqob (Wendt 1962: 19 [text], 18 [tr.]). The ↗Fatḥ madīnat Harar has several references to M. and its sulṭāns (WagFath).

Italian map of Mogadishu 1938; from Guida 571

From the 14th to the 16th cent. M. was apparently under the control of successive Arab and Somali sultanates (but only the name of Muᶜaffar b. Al-Mālik an-Nāṣir can be mentioned for the 16th cent.; Cerulli 1926). However, from the mid-16th cent. onwards the town started decaying as a result of the expansion of the ↗Hawiye nomads in the hinterland and of the Portuguese (↗Portugal, relations with) on the coast. The Hawiye destroyed the Ağūrān sultanate, which had given M. easy access to the trade routes towards Ethiopia, and thus cut the port town off from its inland markets. On the sea, Vasco da Gama bombarded M. in 1499, but failed to capture it. However, Portuguese (and later British) maritime supremacy in the Indian Ocean and over ↗Red Sea trade routes cut M. off from its commerce with the East and the Islamic world, thereby prompting its precipitous decline.

During the 17th cent. M.'s sultanate disappeared, as the Abgaal, Darandolla, Geledi and other Hawiye clans from the interior first slowly penetrated into the town and eventually overwhelmed it. M. subsequently became divided into the two rival quarters of Ḥamar weyn and Šangānī (where the Darandolla imām settled) and settled into a state of permanent civil war. The Zanzibari/Omani sulṭān Barġaš b. Saᶜīd in 1871 occupied M. and managed it through a local governor (wālī) who had his residence in the Garesa palace (almost between Ḥamar weyn and Šangānī).

In 1889 the Omani leased M. to the Italians and it was declared an Italian protectorate in 1892; in 1905 it was annexed to Benaadir becoming the capital of the new colony of ↗Italian Somaliland.

When the former ↗British Somaliland Protectorate and Italian Somaliland merged to become the independent Somali Republic in 1960, M., the largest city in Somalia, was chosen as capital city and was called the "Union City". Today the Union City lies in ruins, ravished by war lords and marauding gangs of rival militias.

The main landmarks of M. are its old mosques (Monneret de Villiard 1942; Inzerillo 1980; La Lomia 1982): the ǧāmiᶜ of Ḥamar weyn whose minaret was built in 1238; the mosque of Arbaᶜ Rukun dating to 1268; the mosque of Faḫraddīn whose miḥrāb dates 1269 and the mosque of ᶜAbdalᶜazīz in Šangānī probably also going back to the 13th cent.

The Garesa palace is one of most renowned urban constituent of M.: it was restored and transformed into a museum by the Italians in 1933–34 (Guida 568; Caroselli 1934).

Momina

Ayyo M. (birth name Šibbaš [Ebbaš] Wärq, b. [?], Yäğğu, d. 29 October 1929, Faraqasa) was the founder of the ↗pilgrimage centre (↗zāwiya) of ↗Faraqasa in the former ↗Arsi province and a spiritual ↗healer accepted beyond religious boundaries.

The Qubba, the grave and memorial of ayyo Momina in Faraqasa; photo 2005, courtesy of the author

M.'s father was däğğazmač Yəmär (ᶜUmar) Wäldu, her mother's name has not been ascertained (Märša Akalas, Dənqətu Gädlu or Wärqit Gädlu). While Muslims state that she was born a Muslim, Christian oral informants claim that she was a Christian in her early life, with the baptismal name of Ǝḫətä Gäbrəᵓel. Most probably, M. originally came from Sanqa in ↗Yäğğu where she was married to grazmač Wäldä Giyorgis, a nephew of aṣe ↗Yoḥannəs IV. During the last quarter of the 19th cent., when her daughter Bäyyänäčč was five month old, M., for security reasons, left the baby with its father and went to Harärge, and then Arsi. In Bokke near Bišoftuu šayḫ Bar ᶜAli Ğami (or aw ᶜAli, d. 1890) became M.'s spiritual father. According to oral tradition then, following the order of her spirit, she subsequently stayed as a healer and mystic in Arsi (Gado Galama, Badu, Ittisa), in ↗Bale (Zaliba, Bärbäre) and again in Arsi (Gololča, Sole Qawwe). Finally, she established herself in Guna (Gemechu Jemal Geda 2009: 31–38).

During the first years in Guna ayyo M.'s followers co-existed peacefully with the other religious groups and the local authorities. As her popularity increased, however, she was opposed by the ↗näfṭäñña and the Amhara administration who had taken control over Arsi in 1886. Moreover, local Christian priests and purist Muslim scholars defied M. Eventually, her opponents accused her of claiming the titles of yägunaw nəguś ('King of Guna') and yäᵓarusiwa əmmäbet ('Lady of Arsi'), as she was called by her followers. As pressures mounted, ras Täfäri Mäkʷännən's (later aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I) government in 1923 sent a committee to investigate these accusations. Based upon its report, the government expropriated M.'s possessions and detained her. M. was soon released and ordered to leave the area. During exile she continued her work in Araya and ↗Təčo (Gemechu Jemal Geda 2009: 38–41).

In 1926 the Ethiopian government, influenced by M.'s supporters at different administrative levels, ordered the restoration of land confiscated from her, except the land given to the Church. Subsequently, she settled in Faraqasa where she had held land since her first stay in Guna. The government finally approved her new settlement and she could establish her main centre (ibid. 41f.).

M. died of sickness, only two years after having established Faraqasa, and was buried there. Her tomb (qubba, s. ill.) attracts large numbers of pilgrims. M.'s daughter's son qäññazmač Tayyä Mäšäša, although a Christian, became her first spiritual heir (ibid. 42ff.).

Monarchy

I. The Christian Ethiopian monarchy
II. Other monarchies and chiefdoms

I. The Christian Ethiopian monarchy

Strictly speaking, a M. refers to a system of government centred around a single person who either actually rules or serves as the nominal sovereign. At various times monarchs have either been self-appointed or elected by limited groups of people. More commonly it is an inherited institution controlled by dynasties that claim inherent rights to rule. Such was the case in Christian Ethiopia and in other parts of the Horn of Africa.

The origins of Ethiopian kingship (↗Kingship, divine) have been much debated with little resolution. Ethiopian monarchical traditions seem to have been drawn from various sources: ancient Semitic practices; South Arabian precedents, quite possibly from Nile Valley influences; ancient traditions indigenous to the Horn of Africa; and Persian and probably Byzantine (↗Byzantine Empire) models (Caquot 1957; HabKön). In its turn, however, the Christian M. claimed Ethiopia to be the new Israel (↗Zion) and its dynasty the heirs of King ↗Solomon (↗Solomonic dynasty). The foundation ideology of the Christian M. was exposed in the ↗Kəbrä nägäśt.

The language describing Ethiopian Christian M. reflects diverse origins. The basic lexicon derives from the verb ነግሠ nägśä (Gəᶜəz) or ነገሠ näggäśä (↗Amharic), 'he ruled', from which the word ↗nəguś 'ruler' or 'king' derives. From at least the reign of ↗ᶜEzana at ↗Aksum, in the first half of the 4th cent., Ethiopian monarchs have styled themselves nəguśä nägäśt, 'ruler of rulers' or 'king of kings' (for earlier uses of such terminology s. ↗Sembrouthes). This term was used before the court converted to ↗Christianity (Vycichl 1957). Other titles include ↗žanhoy, which, etymologically, may originate from a Cushitic word for ↗elephant; ↗aṣe, the origin of which is even more obscure; and ḥaṣani (cf. Cerulli 1947). The use of the phrase śəyyumä əgziʾabəḥer, 'elect of God', a title that sets them apart from ordinary mortals, but opens the possibility of the king being judged by standards derived from religious precepts, was adopted in the 19th cent. and by aṣe ↗Yoḥannəs IV and was normative for his successors.

The Christian M. went through three primary stages: classical, medieval and modern. Our understanding of the institution rests on the second period (13th–18th cent.), in particular for the period when Ethiopian kings claimed descent from the biblical King Solomon. However, information on the period of the ↗Zagʷe M. is scant.

From at least the 13th cent. onwards, we have evidence of tension between normative monarchical standards established by canonical texts (↗Fətḥa nägäśt; BlunChr) and evolving, indigenous practice. While the latter was occasionally written down (↗Śərᶜatä mängəśt; Varenbergh 1915–16), and drew upon numerous literary sources, it was essentially created within a framework of common ↗law (↗Customary law). There was a sense of royal absolutism.

The economic basis for the power of the M. lay in the right of the ruler to distribute fiefs in return for military or other services (TadTChurch 98; ↗Feudalism; ↗gʷəlt; ↗rəst; ↗land tenure). However, in practice the power of the kings was greatly limited by powerful court figures, some of them dynastic offshoots; by local noble families; by severe institutional limitations, the absence of a functioning bureaucracy beyond the institutions of the royal court itself (↗Government); and by geo-political realities, since Ethiopia's rugged topography created difficulties in accessing or controlling diverse parts of the kingdom (↗Roads).

The head of the M. was the nəguś or nəguśä nägäśt. Succession was invariably through male descendants from the Solomonic dynasty, but primogeniture did not play a role. Sometimes reigning monarchs successfully designated their successors; just as often, however, succession was determined by the balance of political forces in the royal court (TadTChurch; Toubkis 2004; Pennec – Toubkis 2004).

The ruler and his entourage, which might comprise thousands of people, formed the royal court, whose physical expression was the ↗kätäma (s. also ↗gəbbi). The court mainly consisted of the family of the ruler, which usually counted several wives and concubines and dozens of sons and daughters; members of the extended royal family holding state positions; court clergy; the ↗əč̣č̣äge and his entourage; and lay officers (↗Titles, ranks and functions).

The M. expressed itself through symbols of power. The kettledrum ↗nägarit stood next to the throne and accompanied royal proclamations (↗Awaǧ). The Solomonic M. had also developed an elaborate ↗coronation ceremony held at Aksum, although this was actually only practised by four Emperors, ↗Zärᵓa Yaᶜəqob, ↗Śärṣ́ä Dəngəl, ↗Susənyos and ↗Iyasu I (HabKön 94). Among royal regalia there were also ↗crowns and ↗lions.

The defining elements of Ethiopian M. came into being only through a long evolution and by way of internal and external influences. The Amharic language would have become the main language of the state towards the reign of ↗ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon I. The same ruler invited Coptic officers who contributed to the modernisation of administration and upgraded the ↗army organization (↗Military units and organization). In the 15th cent., ↗Yəsḥaq, Zärᵓa Yaᶜəqob and ↗Ǝskəndər sponsored contacts with Europe (↗Alfonso V, ↗Italy) and thus developed an active diplomatic agenda, probably with the help of Italian agents. In the 16th cent., diplomacy gained momentum with the contacts with ↗Portugal. It was also in this period that the M. began to use ↗historiography as a means to legitimize the memory of the past kings.

Traditionally, the M. was strongly attached to the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church. It has been also claimed that the Christian state, since the times of ↗Yəkunno Amlak, used monastic (↗Monasticism) and church foundations as a strategy to assert territorial expansion (Derat 1998: 123ff.). In the early 17th cent., however, political crisis and ↗Jesuit missionary influence pushed three rulers – ↗Yaᶜəqob, ↗Zädəngəl and Susənyos – to attempt an ambitious religious cum political reform and embrace ↗Catholicism.

While there was some continuity between the medieval Solomonic rule and that of the ↗Gondärine kingdom, the great upheavals of the 16th cent. (1527–32) must have deeply influenced the institution. Ethiopia's monarchical institutions collapsed in the last quarter of the 18th cent., giving way to a period of monarchical weakness known as the ↗Zämänä mäsafənt. M. was not revived again until the middle of the 19th cent. by ↗Tewodros II, ↗Yoḥannəs IV, and ↗Mənilək II, who drew on their knowledge of Solomonic traditions, as filtered through the Gondär period, but also adapted many of these ideas (Crummey 1988).

In the 20th cent. the evolution of the M. was largely coterminous with the career of ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I. He profoundly modified the institutions he inherited, and attempted to develop an absolutism that resembled the monarchies of early modern Europe rather than those of his predecessors (s. Bahru Zewde 1984; ClapHS; Markakis 1974).

II. Other monarchies and chiefdoms

Although often associated with the Christian lands and with the ↗Solomonic dynasty, the institution of M. in Ethiopia existed beyond these realms. Forms of M. existed in several other regions of the Horn of Africa from ancient up to contemporary times (for a definition of M. within the African context cf. LewJimm 3 et passim). In addition, socio-political organisations that included some degree of centralisation and hierarchical structures also existed, such as chiefdoms and sacred M. (↗kingship, divine). The use of a precise terminology for the different political systems of the Orbis Aethiopicus is, however, made difficult by the frequent lack of reliable data, by the structural instability of the polities themselves and, not least, by the bias of past and contemporary European narratives on African societies. Indeed historical polities such as the ↗Gurage, ↗Fäṭägar, ↗Hadiyya, ↗Ǝnnarya and ↗Käfa are often described in European sources as "kingdoms" and their chiefs as "kings" (e.g., Alvares 1883: 141, 145, 166; BecRASO II, 283–86; III, 452, 457 et passim; V, 16; VI, 253–69; CecZeila vol. 2, 80 et passim; for a critical review of the use of the term Empire as employed by Bieber, cf. HabKön 294–97), but the degree of accuracy in the use of these terms remains unclear. It was often the case that authors projected categories from their own systems of thought onto societies they were conceptually ill-equipped to describe (for a valuable discussion of ethnocentrism in Western scholarship on Africa, cf. MacGaffey 2005, esp. 190–95, 203–06; and James 1990).

Before the rise of the Aksumite kingdom (↗Aksum), towards the 8th cent. B.C., the kingdom of ↗DᶜMT was in place in the areas around ↗Yəḥa, which may have also served as its capital. The kingdom had close links with South Arabia and probably ↗Nubia (cf. also ↗Kush). A polity that emerged later but of which little is known is the ḤBŠT (↗Ḥabašāt); Conti Rossini described it as a kingdom and located it in the areas to the south of the ↗Märäb and ↗Bäläsa in today's Eritrea (CRStor 113; Conti Rossini 1906).

With the emergence of ↗Islam, a number of centralized state systems were formed in the Muslim-ruled polities in the eastern part of the central Ethiopian highlands. An early state was the ↗Maḫzūmī sultanate of ↗Šäwa, in place from the 11th to the 13th cent. Later, the ↗Ifat and ↗ᶜAdal states appeared, ruled by the ↗Walašma dynasty from the 13th to the 16th cent. The emirate of ↗Harär was active from the 17th to the 19th cents. Other Muslim states that might have been ruled with some degree of centralization were ↗Dankáli (ᶜAfar) and ↗Dahlak as well as the Sudanese sultanate of Sinnār (↗Funǧ). However, the office of these rulers is better understood by referring to the indigenous titles they gave themselves, such as ↗sulṭāns and ↗šayḫs.

In ↗Damot, a M. ruled by queens as well as by kings, was allegedly active from the 10th cent. (Cerulli 1943: 284f.), but little is know of the actual functioning of this state and sources are scant (on the importance of female rulers in Africa cf. Irstam 1944: 167–75). Further to the south, between the ↗Abbay and the ↗Omo rivers, a number of Muslim and non-Christian states and principalities were also in place since at least the 14th cent.: Gurage, Fäṭägar, Hadiyya, Ǝnnarya, Wälaytta, and Käfa. Most of these polities were in contact with the Solomonic M. This occurred through war, which was frequently waged to exert supremacy, take booty and control ↗trade routes; but contacts also came by way of trade and intermarriage between the ruling families of the different M. (e.g., Alvares 1883: 52; ↗Ǝleni). It is through these contacts that political institutions might have been transmitted from one polity to the other. Although such diffusion of political and symbolic institutions was in no way unidirectional, local foundation narratives claim that several ruling families came from the northern Ethiopian regions dominated by ↗Amharic and ↗Təgrəñña-speakers (such as ↗Təgray and ↗Dämbəya; also ↗Amaaro) and other regions such as Ǝnnarya. According to these narratives northern migrants founded a number of local dynasties around the Omo valley: the Kawka rulers of ↗Dawro, originally from ↗Gondär; the "Təgre" rulers of ↗Wälaytta; the "Ǧänǧäro" (↗Yäm) ruling dynasties, also of alleged Gondär origin; the "Sippen" rulers in Gamo (Haberland 1993: 141; HabKön 242ff.); and the ↗Gonga, whose chiefdoms would have been founded by rulers from Hinnaryo (Ǝnnarya). Eike ↗Haberland presented these narratives and other analogies as evidence of the diffusion of socio-political institutions from Christian-Solomonic ("Hoch-Äthiopien") and "West-Cushitic" to non-Christian polities (Haberland 1976: 8ff.; HabKön 219–35). Yet, whilst such hypotheses are debatable (for a criticism of Haberland's position, cf. James 1990: 110), it appears that Ethiopian dynasties and societies became an important source of political legitimacy throughout the Ethiopian highlands.

During the 19th cent. a number of M. emerged in the ↗Sidamo and ↗Gibe regions, chiefly the Gonga kingdoms and the kingdom of ↗Ǧimma Abbaa Ǧifaar (LewJimm). Although their population was ethnically mixed, the use of the ↗Oromo language prevailed. M. institutions might have emerged there due both to the strengthening of the authority of traditional office-holders (↗abbaa dulaa, ↗abbaa bokkuu, ↗mooti) and to the rise of powerful clans and lineages (Abir 1965: 206; Oren 1970: 272ff.). Rulers such as ↗Abbaa Bagiboo I, ↗Abbaa Ǧifaar I, ↗Abbaa Ǧifaar II, ↗Abbaa Gomol I and ↗Abbaa Gomol II established strong states based on the intensification of trade (wherein ↗slavery was a major asset) and diplomacy, strict ↗taxation and control of the ↗army and the adoption of ↗Islam (cf. Abir 1965). The expansion of the kingdom of ↗Šäwa under ↗Mənilək II and the creation of the modern centralized Ethiopian state under ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I marked the end of these M. In the ↗Beni Šangul area during the 19th cent. the aristocratic group ↗Waṭāwīṭ rose as the dominant power.

Until recent times, there also existed principalities and chieftainships around the Omo valley, such as the ↗Dizi and ↗Maǧi. Their relatively small size, modest economy and dynamic political structure precluded their evolving into full-scale M., although they shared some institutions with the latter, such as ritual ↗burials and enthronement ceremonies (Haberland 1993: 128, 246–50, 293–96). More widespread than monarchical political institutions were forms of sacred kingship, such as those found among the ↗Šeko, Amaaro and "Ǧänǧäro" (Yäm) studied by Helmut ↗Straube, and the Baka studied by Adolf Ellegard ↗Jensen (VSAe III, 36, 45 et passim, 330 et passim; VSAe I, 31 et passim).

Monasticism

The term M., derived from the Greek mónos 'one, alone', refers to a distinctive religious category of persons, who, through a specific discipline and religious orientation, devote themselves to religious goals. In Ethiopia, M. (Gə^{c}əz, Amh.: ምንኵስና, mənk^{w}əsənna) is one of the central institutions of Ethiopian ↗Christianity. As such, Ethiopian M. has managed to maintain its spirit and heritage in the changing world, and, till today, remains by far the strongest among the monastic traditions of the seven Oriental churches (with more than 1000 monasteries officially registered in 2001, s. Persoon 2003: 330).

History

The Ethiopian church tradition sees the forerunners and prototypes of M. in personages of O.T. and N.T.: ↗Enoch, ↗Melchizedek, Elijah on Mount Carmel and ↗Ezra, ↗John the Baptist, and, finally, Christ, "the first hermit" (Persoon 2003: 56f.). But the first examples of ascetic life are traditionally believed to have been brought to Ethiopia towards the end of the 5th cent., with the arrival of the ↗Nine Saints. They are thought to have established M. in the country through their activities in North Ethiopia (↗Təgray). Abba ↗Liqanos of Däbrä Qʷänaṣəl and abba ↗P̣änṭälewon of Däbrä ᶜAsbo settled on the outskirts of ↗Aksum. Abba ↗Afṣe went to ↗Yəḥa in the north-east. However, it is now difficult to prove the existence of ancient monastic communities at those sites (according to the Vitae, some of the Nine Saints, like P̣änṭälewon, clearly followed hermitic pattern of ascetic life; cp. Brita 2010). The most venerated of the group was abunä ↗Zämikaᵓel Arägawi, who is considered to have founded ↗Däbrä Damo, one of Ethiopia's most illustrious and ancient coenobitic ↗monasteries. Zämikaᵓel Arägawi's role in the introduction of the monastic tradition to Ethiopia is specifically stressed. His spiritual genealogy, included in his Vita, directly links him to the monastic tradition of ↗Egypt, making him a direct disciple of ↗Pachomius (a detail also featuring in the Vitae of other Nine Saints). The so-called monastic Rules of Pachomius (as well as, e.g., the Vita of St. ↗Anthony) were indeed translated into Gəᶜəz from Greek (cp. ↗Monastic literature), proving the relevance of M. in the early period of Ethiopian history.

Apart from the Nine Saints, apparently numerous groups of (anonymous) monks, remembered in the Ethiopian tradition as ↗Ṣadəqan, conducted their missionary activities in the period after the introduction of Christianity. Some of them became the first martyrs of the Ethiopian Church (↗Martyrdom). The (later) hagiography which emerged in connection with their veneration shows that they practised various forms of asceticism known in the Christian Middle East, but their direct impact on the nascent Ethiopian tradition of M. remains unclear. In fact, information on M. in ancient Ethiopia is still very scanty, difficult to support from archaeological evidence, and cannot provide a coherent picture of the phenomenon during the Aksumite period.

M. became a dominant force in the country's national Church only in the late 13th–14th cent., crucial to the spread of Christianity and underpinning the political domination of the ↗Solomonic dynasty. Having quickly encompassed vast areas, Ethiopian M. acquired a remarkably decentralized character. As a consequence, from the 13th to 15th cent., a number of M. movements arose, centred upon a few major monasteries and led by charismatic monastic leaders.

The earliest development of a new monastic movement, associated with the name of abunä ↗Täklä Haymanot and centred upon ↗Däbrä Libanos, the chief monastery in South Ethiopia, and related communities started in the historical ↗Šäwa province. It came to particular prominence during the reign of aṣe ↗ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon I. The monks of the "house of Täklä Haymanot" refused royal gifts, denounced royal polygamy, and denied royal jurisdiction over the monasteries. Within a century, however, they had made their peace with the rulers and henceforth Däbrä Libanos was a major recipient of royal patronage.

The second M. movement, associated with the 14th-cent. monk abunä ↗Ewosṭatewos, flourished in the regions of ↗Šire, ↗Säraye, ↗Ḥamasen, ↗Bur, and elsewhere. Basing his claim on the ↗Senodos Ewosṭatewos defended the observance of Saturday as a holy day similar to Sunday. The idea of rejecting the observance of the ↗Sabbath on Saturday as a "Jewish" practice might have originated with the Metropolitan and his entourage. Ewosṭatewos left the country, presumably to search for support. His followers in Ethiopia were persecuted, but ↗Däbrä Bizän and its daughter monasteries in Ḥamasen and elsewhere became centres of the ↗Ewosṭatean movement. In 1450 aṣe ↗Zärᵓa Yaᶜəqob summoned a Church council at ↗Däbrä Məṭmaq which resolved the discord by conceding to the demands of the dissidents (CRRicBerhan II, 145–53 [text]; TadTChurch 230f.). The Emperor himself favoured the observance of the Sabbath rest on Saturday. The Ewosṭateans were granted lands and were asked to evangelize the neighbouring regions. For their part, they agreed to accept ordination from the metropolitan, and the once very centralized movement, became a network of loosely connected monastic communities considering Ewosṭatewos or his close disciples as their spiritual fathers.

The third M. movement is linked with the mid-15th-cent. holy man abunä ↗Ǝsṭifanos. According to his Vita, Ǝsṭifanos, having received the monastic habit in the monastery of Däbrä Qʷäyäṣa, soon clashed with his monastic teachers over what he viewed as their rather lax behaviour and the lack of proper asceticism and monastic organization. After several quarrels he was denied communion and established his own community. He later clashed with Zärʾa Yaʿəqob, for he did not accept the latter's authority in religious matters. Ǝsṭifanos eventually died in prison, but the movement of his followers, the ↗Stephanites, was continued after his death by a number of his successors, with the monastery of ↗Gundä Gunde in ʿAgamä serving as its most important centre. The Stephanites reconciled themselves with the Church in the 16th cent.; Gundä Gunde retained its importance as one of the greatest centres of monastic culture, exerting influence over large areas of East Təgray.

Divisions within Ethiopian M. were partially a natural process: monastic institutions were founded in different natural, social and ethnic settings; the monastic "houses", or congregations, emerged independent from each other, and were only loosely bound by ecclesiastic authority. Monastic movements were rooted not only in diverse views concerning certain theological issues and questions of monastic organization (recurrent surge of the purist and radical attitudes to the ascetic life), but also in internal divisions within the vast country, and, occasionally, they reflected local opposition to the centralizing policy of the emperors. At the same time, the Ethiopian monastic movements shared many ethical values, attitudes and cultural features inherited from M. in general.

The divisions within Ethiopian M. became deeper in the 17th–19th cent., in the course of the Christological controversies (↗Christology), aggravated by the decentralisation of the state during the period of ↗Zämänä mäsafənt. In the late 19th–20th cent., Ethiopian M. regained its high status and was elevated to one of the symbols of the Ethiopian nation (with monasteries retaining a lot of privileges despite the policies of centralisation and secularisation pursued by aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I).

Monasticism, State and Society

Until the modern period, monks were often the only educated social group in Ethiopia; monasteries and churches being the only centres of ↗education. In religious and political matters, when skills other than military skills were required, the monarch was frequently assisted by clerics. For example, the emperor's secretary and chronicler, ↗ṣäḥafe təʾəzaz, was usually recruited from among the monastic clergy. From the 15th cent. onward, heads of at least some of the monasteries and churches were always at the side of the emperor, and others were summoned when their services were needed. Over a long period, the monasteries were the most permanent institutions in Ethiopian society, while the monks were its most organized and flexible part (cp. Persoon 2003: 64). Monastic leaders always played an active role in the political life of the court, forming alliances with local rulers and with members of the royal family, and seeking to influence the succession process. The influential ↗ʿaqqabe säʿat was originally appointed among the monks of ↗Däbrä Libanos of Šəmäzana and later those of ↗Däbrä Ḥayq Ǝsṭifanos. In the 15th cent. the abbot of Däbrä Libanos received the title of ↗əč̣č̣äge and was seen as the head of Ethiopian M. Throughout much of the subsequent history of the Church the əč̣č̣äge of Däbrä Libanos continued to be the most important indigenous cleric, although he often lived outside of the monastery, or did not even come from it. During the period of the ↗Gondärine kingdom he resided in ↗Gondär; the community of Däbrä Libanos itself moved closer to the imperial capital. Since 1951, and the ordination of an Ethiopian as head of the Church, the office of əč̣č̣äge has largely lost its raison d'etre.

Organization

Ethiopian M. has been coenobitic in its mainstream (the so-called andənnät-rule); idiorythmic types of organization also existed, giving the members of the community more independence and privacy (the so-called qʷərit). Besides, there is a strong tradition of eremitic asceticism which still survives: hermits living within the frames of the organizational structures of the respective monasteries, or independent hermits (both accommodated within the indigenous concept of baḥtawi, s. ↗hermits; cp. Persoon 2003: 236ff.).

Coenobitism in Ethiopia can be traced back to Pachomius, the founder of Egyptian M. Although the Ewosṭateans and Stephanites had a clear monastic organization, which combined a well-defined hierarchical structure with extreme regimentation regarding the behaviour of the monks, Ethiopian M. was generally characterized by a considerable degree of autonomy. Despite the importance of the Ethiopian monastic "houses", they rarely possessed the clarity and cohesiveness of Catholic “orders”. Based upon the general principles of the ascetic life, the particular communities usually determined their rules by themselves (Gəᶜəz: śərᶜat, śərᶜatä gädam; Amh.: dänb; usually transmitted orally, in a few cases written down; s. EAE vol. 3, “Monastic literature: normative rules and rituals”); sometimes, the rules are traced back to the authority and charisma of the community’s founder himself. Individual monasteries differ considerably regarding the details and strictness of their rules. The high Church authorities, including the metropolitan (↗Pappas), had only very limited ability to intervene in the daily activities of the monasteries. Again, the intervention of emperors in monastic affairs did not usually affect internal regulations (but was mostly limited to deposing and appointing heads of monasteries).

A certain “fluidity” and flexibility has always been referred to as a remarkable feature of M. in Ethiopia. Apart from the coenobium and hermits, Ethiopian M. includes a number of alternative lifestyles (not always considered positively by the Church hierarchy): wandering mendicant monks; monks and nuns living at local churches individually or in small groups; elderly monks and nuns living with their families after they took the monastic vow (Persoon 2003: 230–36).

The classic abode of the monastic community is the “wilderness” or “desert” (cp. ↗gädam), in most cases, in areas which are difficult to access, far from large settlements. However, M. in the urban context is a phenomenon which quickly gained importance (ibid. 216–23).

Monastic Discipline and Asceticism

By virtue of their monastic vocation and ascetic life style, monks acquired a unique status which enabled them to fill a vital mediative role in Ethiopian society. The future monks were required to undergo a very strict noviciate; if accepted, they underwent an initiatory rite (taking the monastic vows) which stripped them of their secular identity (cp. ↗Śərᶜatä mənkʷəsənna), of the bonds of kinship and the norms of secular society. They were reborn as new social beings. This is most prominently symbolized by the assumption of a new garb: a long cloak (qämis), a leather ↗qənat-girdle, a round cap (qobᶜ), a new name (↗Names), and, occasionally the ↗askema, during the later stages of the ascetic life. The custom of having boys and girls entering into monastic life at an early age was wide-spread (but not permitted in modern Ethiopia). It is also common for older men and women, generally widowers and widows, to take monastic vows and enter a monastery. Women’s M. have both declined and flourished, with the number of nuns increasing at the present time (cp. Persoon 2003: 265–70; ↗Nunneries).

According to the ↗Fətḥa nägäśt, the major work of Canon ↗law, monks are obliged to be celibate, to abandon their families, to assume the monastic garb, to live with their brethren, to abstain (as much a possible) from meat and other “luxuries”, and to practice asceticism (Paulos Tzadua 1968: 66f.).

The common spiritual and practical guidelines of M. were known in Ethiopia due to translation of monastic literature (Maṣäḥəftä mänäkosat). Most conspicuous among these ascetic labours are celibacy and virginity, poverty, ↗fasting and strong dietary restrictions (esp. abstinence from prepared foods). Reciting the ↗Psalter or prayers is also a central component of monastic discipline. The Ethiopian monastic tradition follows the ↗Arägawi mänfäsawi in distinguishing ten “degrees of the monks” (maᶜərägä mänäkosat) – ten spiritual levels in monastic attainment. Wearing uncomfortable or even painful garments, lack of sleep, restricted movement (standing in one place for long periods) were among the formative ascetic practices in Ethiopia; these and other “exotic” ascetic practices of self-control and self-mortification are said to still exist in Ethiopia (though exercised only by a minority). Some ascetics claim to have acquired supernatural powers (Persoon 2003: 93–97). Esp. in the hagiography, the most extreme ascetics are frequently said to leave the human realm and are compared to ↗angels.

The requirement of conformity of practice sometimes created tensions between the community and individual practitioners striving to perform feats of extreme asceticism.

Monasticism in Betä Ǝsraᵓel

The period that saw the emergence of the three great Christian monastic movements also witnessed a parallel development related to the increasing encroachment of the Christian kingdom. Although a precise date for the emergence of M. among ↗Betä Ǝsraᵓel cannot be given, the evidence strongly suggests that, as elsewhere in Ethiopia, the rise of M. was closely related to the decline of their political standing. This became particularly important after the 17th cent. when the M. communities provided the main focus of leadership following the demise of the secular rulers.

Some scholars have suggested that the emergence of M. may have been a crucial step in the ethnogenesis of the Betä Ǝsraʾel. Although Christian sources report that a 14th-cent. Christian monk named ↗Qozmos joined the ↗Ayhud, the Betä Ǝsraʾel attribute the origin of their M. to abba ↗Sabra, a Christian monk from the 15th cent. who came to them as a missionary but instead converted to their religion. His most important disciple was abba ↗Ṣägga Amlak, who according to some traditions was a son of aṣe Zärʾa Yaʿəqob. Abba Sabra is credited not only with introducing M., but also with the composition of their liturgical ↗music and some religious texts. The laws of purity are also credited to his influence. His disciples are said to have composed prayers. Like Christian M., Betä Ǝsraʾel M. was primarily coenobitic, although individual hermits also existed.

In the 19th cent. the M. of Betä Ǝsraʾel faced great difficulties. Thus abba Wəddaye, the chief monk of the ↗Qʷara region, presided over a revival, at a time when the Betä Ǝsraʾel religion was faced with extinction. In the 1860s another monk, abba Mäḥari stood at the head of a massive migration of Betä Ǝsraʾel who sought to leave Ethiopia, reconstructing the Biblical exodus. The missionary Johannes Martin ↗Flad claimed that Hurharwa, the largest Betä Ǝsraʾel monastery, had about 200 monks, but Joseph ↗Halévy reported only 12 to 15. The number of Betä Ǝsraʾel monks appears to have declined towards the end of the 19th cent. as a result of criticism from both Protestant and Jewish missionaries and because of the great famine (↗Kəfu qän). This decline continued throughout the 20th cent. and only a few individuals remained. No organized M. exists today.

M. is also a major feature of life for the ↗Betä Abrəham craftsmen of northern Šäwa and southern Wällo, who may be the descendants of Betä Ǝsraʾel. Most Betä Abrəham live in some 20 monastic communities.

Moors

M. is a term historically applied in European languages to black people (mainly Africans; Eng. variant: “blackamoors”), Arabs, Berbers and Muslims. This entry focuses on the connection of this ancient term with terms of similar meaning such as Aethiops (cp. ↗Ityopis), and, in addition, on the identification of African background in Europe with the Ethiopian region (↗Aithiopía).

The use of M. is early attested in ↗Strabo (s. EAE vol. 5; Basset 1901: iii) according to whom the term Μαῦϱοι was employed by the Romans (Μαυϱούσιοι by the Greeks) to designate a specific ethnic group inhabiting western Libya (Strabo 1903, XVII, 3, 2), i.e. most of the area occupied by present-day Morocco. This use of the term lingered on in analogous terms used to describe the Turkish and North African invaders of Spain in the Middle Ages, and their descendants.

M. was first used as a synonym for the Greek and Latin term “Aethiops” and, as in Martin Luther’s German Bible translation, for the Hebrew ↗Kush (translated as “Mohrenland”, ‘land of the M.’, in other translations rendered as Aithiopía; Ezek 29: 10). While that term was originally used mainly to designate Nubians, there was no precise delimitation of reference, as dark skinned Arabs and even Indians were likewise included (↗“India” as name of Ethiopia). During the early European incursions into Africa the terms “Ethiopian” and “M.” were subsequently applied to all African people of dark complexion and as a synonym for “blacks” or “negroes” (from Lat. niger ‘black’).

Contact between white Europeans and Christian Ethiopians and Africans increased following the Crusades (↗Italy). A focal point was Sicily, where blacks had been living since the time of the Saracen government (827–1061). European awareness of Africans intensified considerably when the Roman Emperor and German King, Frederick II, ruled over Sicily. Among the Saracen bodyguards and women of his Sicilian court were many blacks. Johannes Maurus had a remarkable career. Born probably as a Muslim slave (↗Slavery) of African descent, he was raised at the court and became the King’s Chamberlain, commander of the Saracen colony of Lucera (Apulia) and vizier of Sicily. Another African Sicilian, Benedict “the Moor” (1526–89), was canonised as a saint in 1807. He was the son of the “Ethiopians” Christopher and Diana Manasseri in San Fratello, Sicily, former slaves who had converted to Christianity. He later became the patron saint of Palermo. A much earlier black saint was St. Mauritius, originally a 3rd-cent. Christian Roman officer from Thebes in Egypt of Nubian origin, martyred in Agaunum (St. Maurice, Switzerland), who became patron saint of the Holy Roman Empire in 962.

Various accounts of the lives of the saints indicate that high rank positions were accessible to black Africans. The majority of them came to Europe over the Mediterranean Sea as slaves, captured mostly in the Sudan and south of it. Sold in Egypt or the Cyrenaica (north-eastern Libya), they were brought to the centres of the European slave trade, Genoa, Naples, and Barcelona.

African communities developed in Venice and Naples in the 16th cent. Spreading from Italian Renaissance cities to the north, “court M.” became fashionable among European nobles as an adornment and an indication of wealth and prestige. The following “Court M.” are particularly noteworthy: Ibrahim Hannibal (Abraham Ganibal), an officer of Tsar Peter the Great and governor of Reval in the 17th cent. (↗Pushkin, Alexander), called “Ethiopian” by his son-in-law and therefore generally assumed to be from Ethiopia; the 18th-cent. court educator, Angelo Soliman, possibly of Ethiopian (↗Oromo?) origin too, in Vienna (recent research identifies him rather as a Kanuri from north-eastern Nigeria). A number of other “court M.” might have been Oromo. The tradition of “court M.” disappeared only in the early 19th cent. The Oromo Pauline ↗Fathme and Karl Aman ↗Habasch, purchased by German noblemen in Egypt, were among the last who came to Europe within the framework of this court tradition.

In the Middle Ages, the M. also became a prominent figure in literature and arts. There are numerous black characters in medieval epics and poetry called M., the most renowned examples being the black queen of the south, Belacâne, and her son, Feirefîz of Parzivâl, by Wolfram of Eschenbach (1200). Some theories suggest that the figure of Belacâne was influenced by Arabic texts referring to the myth of the Queen of Sheba (↗Makədda; cp. ↗Prester John). In the 15th and 16th cents., the term was used for the famous Ethiopian college in Rome (↗Santo Stefano dei Mori).

Further, biblical characters of African origin were widely used, the most famous of which was the Ethiopian Queen of Sheba. From the end of the 13th cent., Gaspar (Caspar), one of the Three ↗Magi, was depicted by Europeans as black. In the Renaissance and Baroque, Africans often figure as ornamental details on portraits of Europeans, coats of arms and other forms of pictorial representation. From the late 16th cent. onwards, "M." were common on European stages, e.g., on Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus and Othello. The regional focus, however, shifts to western Africa and the Americas, especially in the second half of the 18th cent., with the slave trade coming to the fore.

In general, the image of Africans began with a mostly positive, respectful, attitude which prevailed into the late Middle Ages; this was replaced by "exotic" curiosity in the early modern age, and gave way to predominantly pejorative notions ensuing the transatlantic slave trade.

Muḥammad ᶜAlī

M.ᶜA. pasha (محمد علي, birth name Meḥmet ᶜAlī; d. 1848) was a Turkish-speaking Ottoman officer who after being posted to ↗Egypt managed to capture local power, and force his sulṭān, Maḥmud II, to recognize him as a pasha, a provincial governor, in 1805. He remained in power until his death and by then gained the reputation of "the founder of modern Egypt", ensuring the succession of rule to his family, which ruled until 1952. During M.ᶜA.'s rule – as in other periods when Egypt was ruled by a local government, such as the ↗Fāṭimids and the ↗Mamluks – its relationship with Ethiopia intensified.

Striving to build a modern, European-like military power, M.ᶜA. initiated a multi-dimensional modernization process revolving around the Nile economy. He built a new system of dams and irrigation canals, ridding the country of the threat of annual drought. His ambition combined the expansion of Egypt in all directions with a series of modernization projects such as the introduction of cotton and a modern monetary system, importing expertise in various fields from the West, and establishing various engineering and medical schools. He first sought to expand his empire with the authorization of the sulṭān, and in 1813–18 his modernized army destroyed the first Saudi-Wahhabi state in Arabia. In 1818 he was rewarded with the province (vilayet) of Jeddah, which included ↗Massawa and the Ottoman nāᵓib in ↗Ḥərgigo. Between 1820–21 M.ᶜA. initiated the major enterprise of conquering the ↗Sudan. His army was the first Egyptian–Muslim force to penetrate south of Nubia, destroy the sultanates of ↗Funǧ, ↗Sinnār and Kordofan, and unite the Nile Valley under Cairo. In 1830 his men in the Sudan established Khartoum as the capital, and went on colonizing the country, occasionally violating Ethiopia's territory in the process. No direct conflict developed because Ethiopia, during the ↗Zämänä mäsafənt, made no unified effort to counter attack, and both sides preferred only to harbour the other's rebels. In 1838 an Egyptian mapping expedition penetrated through ↗Mätämma, following which M.ᶜA. had to assure the French he had no designs on Ethiopia. Of later significance for Ethiopian–Eritrean history was the Egyptians' encouragement of the Mirġānī family to spread Sufi Islam to the northern Sudan and in the direction of the future Eritrea, among the ↗Beni ᶜAmər clans. This campaign culminated in 1840 with the establishment of Kassala as the Mirġānīya headquarters.

M.ᶜA.'s policy of not interfering actively with Ethiopian affairs was also manifested in his correspondence with ras ↗Ali Alula. The Oromo strongman presented himself as "the sulṭān of Ethiopia" and asked the Egyptians not to send a new abunä. In 1841, however, M.ᶜA. authorized the sending of abunä Sälama, thus indirectly contributing to the beginning of Ethiopia's recuperation. In the same year his men abandoned Massawa.

M.ᶜA.'s restrained policy in Ethiopia can be explained by his general strategy. His whole Sudanese–Nile enterprise was, in his eyes, secondary to the main goal of expanding to the core lands of the Ottoman world. In 1831 he defied the sulṭān and invaded Palestine and greater Syria. In December 1832 he defeated the Ottoman central army but was prevented from marching on Istanbul by European intervention. His centralizing administration remained in the occupied greater Syria, introducing various changes, one of which was relevant to Ethiopia. In 1838 the Coptic monks obtained control over the ↗Dayr as-Sulṭān monastery in Jerusalem, depriving the Ethiopians of their gate keys until 1970. After M.ᶜA. again attacked the sulṭān's army in June 1839, the European powers, for their own considerations, decided to force him back. In September 1840 the British landed in Beirut and M.ᶜA.'s army retreated to Egypt.

Following the demise of his ambitions concerning the Middle East and ↗Ottoman Empire, the pasha turned his focus to the Nile. In 1846 he leased Massawa in order to begin building a modern trade-route via the ↗Red Sea to Khartoum. He was by now, however, too exhausted and senile to pursue a renewed effort. In 1848, just before he died, he returned Massawa to Istanbul.

M.ᶜA.'s importance from an Ethiopian viewpoint lay mainly in the fact that he revived Egypt as an independent and modern state that centred on the Nile. This model of centralization also served as a blueprint for the future emperor ↗Tewodros II.

Muḥammad al-Ḥasan al-Mīrghanī

M. (محمد الحسن الميرغني, Muḥammad al-Ḥasan b. Muḥammad ᶜUṯmān b. Muḥammad Abī Bakr al-Mīrġanī, also known as as-sayyid al-Ḥasan Ab Ğallābīya; b. 28 March 1820, Bāra, Kordofan, d. 23 November 1869, as-Sanīya, near Kassala) was a son of Muḥammad ᶜUṯmān al-Mīrġanī, founder of the Ḫatmīya ↗Islamic brotherhood, and Ruqayya bint Ğallāb from Kordofan. M. spent his childhood in the ↗Sudan before joining his father in the Ḥiǧāz (↗Arabia) at the age of 14. He received a solid education in a range of Islamic religious sciences from his father and other Ḥiǧāz teachers. His initiation to Sufism included the performance of different exercises such as a 19-day long recitation of wird ('litany'), a lengthy ḫalwa ('retreat'), and a ziyāra ('visitation') to the grave of Prophet ↗Muḥammad in Medina. In 1843 M. crossed the Red Sea to ↗Sawākin with his father who ordered him to remain in the Sudan and act there as his representative.

M. travelled widely in the Sudan and in Eritrea, especially in those areas where his father had been successful in initiating followers in the past. He settled in the eastern Sudan at the foot of ↗Kassala Mountain in a village, as-Sanīya, which came to be known as "Ḫatmīya". The village served as the order's base of operations and one of its most important centres for followers in the Sudan and in Eritrea.

From the 1840s to the end of his life M. was able to expand the influence of the Ḫatmīya order in many areas of the Sudan and in Eritrea. This success should be understood in the context of societal, religious and political transformation in the 19th cent. The centralization and consolidation of political authority under the Egyptian administration transformed structures of social, political and religious authority in "tribes" and other social groupings. New holy families associated with the "Islamic Revival" appeared on the Sudanese scene. These families were centralized yet geographically unbound. The Mīrġanī family was perhaps the most successful in developing its influence by combining religious prestige with a new style of organization and religious leadership. Its measured cooperation with the Egyptian administration also significantly contributed to its appeal and effectiveness. In some sense the Ḫatmīya served as an intermediary between the Egyptian administration and the people and contributed to maintaining a degree of social stability. For example, in 1864–65 M. used his influence to end a mutiny of Sudanese troops in Kassala.

M.'s success in consolidating the Ḫatmīya in the Sudanese area can also be attributed to his person. His mother was Sudanese, he spent most of his life in the Sudan and was venerated more as a Sudanese Sufi holy man (↗walī) devoted to his followers through the application of his baraka ('blessing power') than a Meccan scholar as his father was. Therein lies another factor for the success of the Ḫatmīya: its leaders were respected both as scholars by the ᶜulamāᵓ establishment and were venerated by commoners as holy men. In other words, the synthesis between what is referred to as "orthodox" and "popular" approaches to religious devotion and practice "Sudanized" the Ḫatmīya and integrated it into pre-existing traditional and local religious configurations without radically disrupting them.

Under M.'s leadership the Ḫatmīya was able to spread its influence in the northern and eastern Sudan and Eritrea, and to some extent in the central Sudan and Kordofan. In the eastern Sudan the Ḫatmīya attracted followers from among the ↗Beǧa groupings: the Bišarin, ↗Hadándowa, Amarar and the ↗Beni ᶜAmər. M. attracted followers also in Eritrea, mainly among the Beni ᶜAmər, the Halanqa and the ↗Ḥabab, who were going through momentous processes of internal transformation. His activities went hand in hand with Egyptian efforts to establish their control in the area and also contributed significantly to the process of Islamization and the consolidation of recently converted Muslim communities in Eritrea.

M. died of fever while on a visit to Ǧabal Taqorba in the Beni ᶜAmər area. He was buried in as-Sanīya, where a shrine was erected over his grave. M. is still deeply venerated as one of Sudan's foremost holy men.

Among M.'s few and short written works, various devotional prayers were compiled and published in Muḥammad ᶜUṯmān al-Mīrġanī, Maǧmūᶜ al-awrād al-kabīr (published several times in Cairo, s. O'Fahey 1994: 192f.), as well as a vision of the Prophet in a dream published in ar-Rasāʾi al-Mīrġanīya, Cairo 1939.

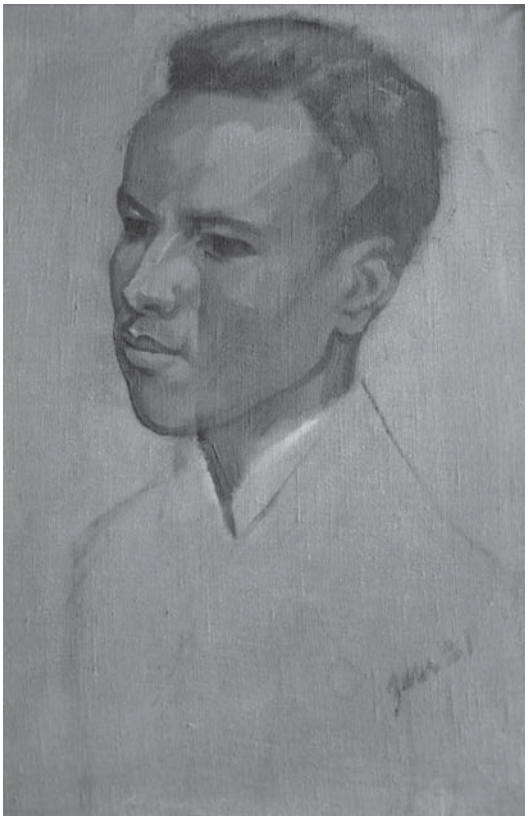
Muḥammad Nūr

M.N. (Somali: Maxamed Nuur; b. ca. 1895, Berbera [?], d. ?) was the first North-east-African employed at Hamburg University in the early 20th cent. He was an important linguistic informant and Somali poet (cp. von Tiling 1927–28).



Portrait in oil of Muḥammad Nūr from the 1920s; courtesy of the Hiob Ludolf Centre for Ethiopian Studies, University of Hamburg

M.N. was a soldier from ↗British Somaliland who served in the British Army during ↗World War I and who was captured by German troops and brought to Germany. In 1917, the newly founded Kolonialinstitut ('Institute for Colonial Affairs') in Hamburg, the predecessor of Hamburg University, made contact with him and convinced the military authorities to allow him to work as a language assistant at the Institute. Maria von ↗Tiling (later von Tiling-Klingenheben), scientific assistant of the Institute's director, Meinhof, recorded numerous oral texts in the ↗Berbera dialect of Somali from him and published some of them (cp. von Tiling 1925; 1927–28). Her works on the ↗Somali language are largely based on collaboration with him. M.N. proved to be very knowledgeable and amply illustrated the vitality of traditional ↗Somali oral literature. After the foundation of the University in 1919, he was employed as a language assistant (joined in 1920 by Wäldä Maryam Dästa as the first Amharic language assistant); in 1922 M.N.'s contract ended, and he went back to British Somaliland.

M.N.'s work as a linguistic informant marks the beginning of serious scholarly studies of Somali oral literature, and, in addition, he inaugurated a long series of linguistic assistants (later lectors) from North-East-Africa employed at Hamburg University, thus influencing the institutionalization of a focus on Cushitic and Ethio-Semitic languages and cultures in Hamburg (↗Ethiopian Studies).

Museums

Museums in Ethiopia

M. are permanent institutions caring for the acquisition, preservation, documentation, scholarly interpretation and public and educational presentation of artefacts and natural objects. Moreover, M. are centres of cultural memory, scholarly exchange and public discourse. They also function as major destinations of ↗tourism.

Museums in Addis Abäba

In Addis Abäba the most important M. are the National Museum and Archaeological Institute (s. also ↗Gəzaw Ḫaylä Maryam), the Ethnographic Museum of the ↗Institute of Ethiopian Studies (↗Addis Ababa University), and the Addis Ababa Museum. The National Museum was the first M. in Addis Abäba. It was founded in 1958 as the Archaeological Museum, at that time a branch of the archaeological section of the National Library. Today, it exhibits items from its archaeological, palaeontological, ethnographic and modern arts collections as well as royal paraphernalia and costumes. The second M. to be founded was the Ethnographic Museum in 1963. It is located in aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I's ↗Gännätä Lə^{c}ul palace. Its collections were mainly gathered by the Anthropological Society, that in 1951 launched field research and the collection of objects of everyday life. Today, the M. has an ethnographic department and an art exhibition, displaying Christian art (richest collection worldwide of Ethiopian icons), folk ↗paintings and examples of modern Ethiopian ↗art (s. EAE vol. 5) as well as an ethno-musicological collection. Some historical buildings in Addis Abäba serve as M. as well, e.g., aṣe ↗Mənilək II's first palace in ↗Ǝnṭoṭṭo (↗Gəbbi) and the Mənilək II Mausoleum. There is also a small M. in the ↗Jubilee Palace. Since 1986 the Addis Ababa Museum, located in one of the oldest buildings of the city, the former house of ras ↗Bərru Wäldä Gäbrə^{c}el, has presented the history of the Ethiopian capital.

Other M. in Addis Abäba are the Ethio–Djibouti Railways Museum inside the railway station (La Gare) and the National Postal Museum (founded in 1970, s. ↗Stamps).

Addis Ababa University hosts Ethiopia's only M. exclusively dedicated to natural sciences. The Zoological Natural History Museum was established in 1955 at the then University College. Its huge collection of mounted specimens, collected by Saverio Patrizi during the Italian occupation and, later, by members and partners of the Department of Biology, is exhibited on the science faculty compound. The National Herbarium (established in 1959) can be found at the same place.

Regional and local museums

A growing number of M. in Ethiopia are dedicated to regional and local history, ethnography and archaeology, but also to the regional dimension of national history.

In ↗Addis ᶜAläm the M. at the Maryam church (the old M. burned down in 1997 and was reopened in 2004) presents a collection of vestments, ↗crowns, religious paraphernalia and ↗manuscripts.

In the city of ↗Harär the Government Museum exhibits antiquities from Harär, and the Community Museum presents the culture of the ↗Harari. A small handicraft M. can be visited in the so-called palace of ras Mäkʷännən in Harär. A late 19th-cent. house is dedicated to the French writer and trader Arthur ↗Rimbaud. It provides some information on the poet and hosts a collection of photographs (↗Photography) of old Harär as well as a small Harari ethnographic collection.

The regional M. in ↗Mäqälä is located in the palace of aṣe ↗Yoḥannəs IV. The M. exhibits archaeological troves from ↗Yəḥa and Aksum, historical and ethnographic objects as well as a collection of icons and furniture, vestments and other objects formerly in the possession of Yoḥannəs IV and his family.

The regional M. in ↗Däse, opened in 1980 in the former residence of däǧǧazmač Yosef, shows historical, ethnographical and natural objects from the former Wällo province (Briggs 2009: 327).

The ↗Oromo culture is the subject of the M. in ↗Naqamtee founded in 1989. Another ethnographic collection from the region is housed in the former palace of ↗Gäbrä Ǝgziʾabəḥer Moroda. The town of ↗Asosa also has an ethnographic M.

The ↗Ǧimma M. displays the arts and crafts of the former ↗Käfa province, and a great part of the heritage of the kings of Ǧimma taken from the former palace of ↗Abbaa Ǧifaar II in ↗Ǧirän which serves as a M. as well.

A pioneering cultural M. was founded in 1966 in Soddo, Wälaytta, by the then governor däǧǧazmač Wäldä Sämayat Gäbräwäld (r. 1963–73), displaying artefacts of the ↗Wälaytta people.

Today, following the policy of "ethnic federalism", and in order to strengthen ↗ethnicity, the regional and local administrations are encouraged to collect ethnographic items. Many M. are planned for the future and some possible M. have not yet passed the early stage of collecting and storing. Although many efforts have been made towards professionalizing the modes of preservation and presentation, the present state of M. is in many cases far below expectations. Small local M. often lack funds, suffer from political interference, and are often not regularly supervised by scholars or other experts.

Some examples of already established local or regional M. and M. projects are, e.g., the Səlṭe Museum in Werabe, the ↗Gamo Gofa Museum in Arba Mənč̣ (and a Crocodile M. near Arba Mənč̣), the Coffee Museum in Bonga, Käfa (opened in 2007), and the ↗Konso Museum in Karat (opened in 2009). In 2001 a regional M. was established in Semera town to present the cultural and historical heritage of the ᶜAfar people.

A model M. established in close collaboration with scholars and local people is the South Omo Museum and Research Centre in ↗Ǧinka, officially inaugurated in 2002. It was organized on the initiative of the German anthropologist Ivo Strecker and the Society of Friends of the South Omo Research Center. It presents small ethnographic collections from, and the living heritage of, the ethnic groups inhabiting the area (↗Aari, ↗Hamar, ↗Banna, ↗Ñaŋatom, ↗Đáasanač, ↗Kara, ↗Kwegu-Muguǧi, ↗Mursi, Bodi (↗Meᵓen), ↗Maale, ↗Ṣamay, ↗Arbore, ↗Suri, ↗Bäšada); it functions as their meeting place and is a base for researchers.

Church museums

Before the establishment of M. in Ethiopia, churches and monasteries were the major depositories for objects of Ethiopian Orthodox material culture (s. also ↗crosses, ↗manuscripts, ↗relics etc.) as well as for other treasures (e.g., royal crowns). Some of these objects were regularly displayed or used on ceremonial occasions while others were simply stored in the ↗ᶜəqa bet. Whether these treasures also served the function of an economical back-up reserve cannot be said today. Since the beginnings of tourism some local churches open their treasuries from time to time (e.g., Wərra Kidanä Məḥrät of ↗Zäge, ↗Ǝnda Abba Gärima monastery near Yəḥa) for a small entrance fee. Other churches, such as, e.g., Sälam Adrəgiw Maryam in Baḥər Dar (s. ↗Gälanäš Ḥaddis), may show commemorative objects upon request. In such cases the term "M." may be used locally.

The oldest Ethiopian church M. is that of ↗Ǝnṭoṭṭo Maryam. It was after thieves had entered the treasury of the church, that the M., supported by the patriarch abunä Täklä Haymanot, funded by the Ministry of Culture and organized by Anne Saurat, was established in 1986. The M. houses collections of ecclesiastical and secular ceremonial paraphernalia, such as crosses, bells, icons, umbrellas, vestments, musical ↗instruments, and manuscripts. Furthermore, photographs, medals, coins (↗Numismatics) as well as various furniture, weapons, ↗jewellery and other objects belonging to Mənilək II, Ṭaytu and the royal house are displayed (Mengistu Gobezie 2010).

Another important church M. in Addis Abäba is that of ↗Gännäta Ṣəge Giyorgis (established in 1986). It hosts collections of religious items and objects connected to Ḫaylä Śəllase I and his court. Recently, a small M. was established on the compound of the Patriarchate of the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church. The ↗Qəddəst Śəllase cathedral has also opened its collection to the public.

The M. of ↗Aksum Ṣəyon is an important church M. outside of Addis Abäba. Others to be mentioned are the small M. of ↗Däbrä Ḥayq Ǝsṭifanos, ↗Däbrä Wärq of Goǧǧam and Gəmǧa Bet Maryam church of ↗Gondär.

Cultural heritage sites

Recognized World Heritage Sites in Ethiopia are the Gondär palaces and castles (since 1979), the ↗Lalibäla ↗rock-hewn churches (since 1979), the ↗Aksum sites (since 1980), ↗Ṭəya (since 1980), the historic town of Harär (since 2006), and paleo-anthropological sites in the Lower ↗Awaš Valley and the Lower ↗Omo Valley (both since 1980; s. also ↗hominids). Several other sites may gain this status, such as, e.g., the paleo-anthropological site of ↗Konso-Gardula, the Lake ↗Ṭana churches and monasteries, Adadi Maryam and other rock-hewn churches. (For natural heritage sites s. ↗National Parks, for further archaeological sites s. ↗Archaeology.)

The Aksum Stelae Park is an open-air M. The Aksum National Museum on the compound of ↗Gäbrä Śəllase Barya Gäbər, opened in 2007, is associated with it. It already existed since 1974 as the Aksum Archaeological Museum on the compound of Aksum Ṣəyon. The M. presents Sabean, pre-Aksumite and Aksumite artefacts from various excavations.

Other important Aksumite sites with the character of an open-air M. can be found around ↗Wəq̱ro (ᶜAddi Käwəḫ Site M. with excavations, founded in 2010; another is planned).

In southern Ethiopia, besides Ṭəya, the open-air M. of ↗Mälka Qunṭure has to be mentioned.

Private museums and memorial museums

Ethiopia has a small number of private M. Two very differing examples are the Abdullahi Ali [ᶜAbdallāhi ᶜAli Šarīf] Private Museum in Harär exhibiting old Harari manuscripts and coins, and the Black Lion Museum in ↗Šašämänne displaying objects related to the ↗Rastafari movement.

In the last decade a number of "M." or semi-governmental memorials associated with permanent exhibitions were established in the various capitals of the Ethiopian regions, e.g., in Baḥər Dar and Mäq̱älä. Their aim is to maintain the historical memory of the struggle against the Därg regime (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council). The status of the exhibitions as "M." is debatable because of their clearly identifiable propagandistic approach, but the collections presented are nevertheless of some historical interest. Less focussed on heroism but on victims of totalitarian rule is the Red Terror Martyr Memorial Museum, opened in Addis Abäba in 2010, which is run by an organization of victims of the Därg.

Museums in Eritrea

Before Eritrean independence, the main M. in the country was the ↗Asmära Archaeological Museum, located in the Liceo Scientifico F. Martini (Rasmusson 1961: 124). Its collections became part of the National Museum of Eritrea which was inaugurated in 1992 in the old government palace. The National Museum's exhibition has the following sections: Archaeology, Ethnography and Natural History (including palaeontology). The archaeological collection is the largest section. The collections include artefacts from the excavations of ↗Adulis, inscribed tombstones from the ↗Daḥlak Islands, Sabean artefacts and scrolls in Gəᶜəz. Apart from organizing exhibitions, the M. is also active in the fields of research and excavation. The National Museum has a branch in Massawa.

Nägärä Maryam

The N.M. (ነገረ ፡ ማርያም, 'Story of Mary') is apparently an original Ethiopic apocryphal composition, based on many sources of various origins, that develops the account of ↗Mary's flight from Herod (Mt 2:13–17). The text is very popular and is transmitted in a large number of manuscripts, under different titles. The introduction specifies that the text is called "Little Gospel in the language of the Egyptians" and N.M. in "that of the Ethiopians". Some manuscripts give it the title of Gädlä Maryam (ms. kept in the Nägärä Maryam church, Qʷəsqʷam; Jäger 1960:371); many leave the text untitled (ms. kept in Däbrä Marqos). The N.M. has not been translated or published yet, apart from an Amharic version; an untitled compilation from ms. BritLib Add. 16,193, containing much material of the N.M. (erroneously called Täʾammərä Maryam wäʾIyäsus by Conti Rossini 1899:627) was edited for an unpublished Ph.D. (Emery 1959).

The N.M. begins with the genealogy of St. Mary (in which most of the names of her ancestors, except those of her parents, are invented for the purpose), followed by her childhood, the annunciation, and Jesus's early life. The main part is a story of her and her family's wanderings in Egypt – with a stay, among others, in Ethiopia. The names of regions, cities and their rulers are more or less fantastic. On her way, Mary performs a number of miracles, blessing and healing those who are good to her and punishing those who are bad to her, most often by turning those punished into animals. The punishment is sometimes reverted at the intervention of Joseph who appeals to Mary's mercy.

Besides Mt 2:13–17, N.M. inserts other episodes from Gospel narratives (e.g., the ↗Magi, Mt 2:1–12; Jesus in the synagogue in Nazareth, Lk 4:16–22). It also borrows from other apocryphal compositions, such as The Story of King Dämatyanos of Lebanon and of Gigar (transmitted in, e.g., some manuscripts of the ↗Täʾammərä Maryam, BritLib Orient. 604 [tr. Budge 1922] and BN d'Abbadie 158 [ed. Ricci 1949]): on hearing about Herod's iniquities the king was prepared to march with his army against him, but was stopped by an angel. Gigar (the name otherwise known from anthroponymy of the ↗Zämänä mäsafənt, perhaps an effect of the popularity of the N.M.), appointed governor of Syria, though in Herod's service, was a believer who was tortured and eventually put to death, together with his family, by Herod. Gigar is commemorated in the ↗Sənkəssar on 16 Näḥase.

Other discernible sources are the Protevangelium of James (↗Lədäta lämaryam), the ↗Infancy Gospel of Thomas (s. EAE vol. 5; the number of the borrowed episodes may vary), the Life of ↗John the Baptist (CANT no. 184) (?), the Vision of ↗Theophilos (CANT no. 56). In some versions (e.g., manuscript from Däbrä Marqos), the N.M. ends with the scene of the Dormition of Mary – the source being apparently ↗Fəlsäta lämaryam.

The N.M. is difficult to date. The 15th cent. has been suggested by Ricci (RicLett 834), on the basis of its themes and parallels to the ↗Täʾammərä Iyäsus, and it is retained in the entry ↗Mary: Marian literature, on the assumption that most of the Marian literature came into being, or was translated, in the period of aṣe ↗Zärʾa Yaʿəqob. However, none of the known manuscripts is older than the 17th cent. which may indicate a later date of creation. Some of the episodes are probably aetiological, as, e.g., the one in which it is recounted that a place in which Mary stayed for 9 months was called by her Nazareth (↗Nazret).

A foreign origin has often been traditionally accepted for the N.M. Ricci (RicLett 834), perhaps guided by the reference in the introduction to "the language of the Egyptians", assumed an Egyptian origin for the N.M. This could probably be said of some of its sources, such as the Vision of Theophilos. While the Vision does show several parallels with the N.M. (such as the narration about the flight to Egypt; Emery 1959:44), the two texts have little in common (ibid. 31). On the other hand, the presence of local Ethiopian toponyms, such as the River ↗Täkkäze (Emery 1957:160), or the city of Nazret, and even aetiological attempts at explaining names of places such as Məhərka Maryam (↗Məhərka Dəngəl) – 'The Booty of Mary' (ibid. 97) suggest the Ethiopian origin of the N.M.

Frequently, the N.M. is divided into twelve parts for reading in as many months. The text is often read after the mass. The number and the order of episodes vary from one manuscript to another. Some of them, or even entire monthly sections, were incorporated into new compositions, such as those entitled ↗Dərsanä Maryam (e.g., EMML nos. 2461, 4279, 4355; 19th–20th cent.).

Another N.M., versified, but strongly abbreviated, is transmitted on nine folios in ms. BritLib Orient. 790, 18th cent., fols. 184v–192r.

There is also a relatively new, as it seems, Amharic version (Cambridge, University Library, Or. 1877, 19th cent.; BritLib Orient. 13223, 20th cent.), that strongly differs from the Gəʿəz original (Ullendorff – Wright 1961: 46). The published version (1968) is probably based on this text.

Nägärä Maryam in art

The pictorial programme for the N.M. was invented to illustrate the ↗manuscripts. Later it was introduced in the murals and rarely in ↗painting on wood. Since the oldest known illuminated manuscripts are dated to the first quarter of the 18th cent., we may surmise that the first layouts were created about 1700.

Some N.M. manuscripts show miniatures, usually full-page and at the beginning and/or the end, which have no direct connection to the text (↗Mary and Child; ↗Trinity; ↗Crucifixion; ↗Kʷərʿatä rəʾəsu; St. ↗George). Quite often they were later additions. The other copies contain pictorial cycles which follow the text narratives. The subject and number of the miniatures depend on the composition of the text. They may occupy a full-page, half page or just a space in part of one column. Since the large miniatures usually depict not only one but a group of events, the narrative is closely followed by the illustrations. The manuscripts of that kind may also include iconic, opening and closing miniatures. These sumptuous books were usually executed for the members of royal or noble families and their production involved more than one painter. The iconographical sources include western devotional images and the collections of wood-cuts circulating in Ethiopia since the 16th cent., which were modified according to Ethiopian painting tradition and local tastes. Stylistically, all the known miniatures (including manuscripts from the 19th–20th cent.) belong to the second Gondär school of painting. The lavishness of the N.M. manuscript illuminations contributed considerably to the popularity of the text itself.

The following manuscripts are particularly important from the point of view of art history:

BritLib Orient. 603, ordered by aṣe ↗Bäkaffa, decorated with over 260 miniatures; it may have served as the Vorlage for the other royal N.M. manuscripts; BritLib Orient. 602, executed between 1721–23 for Bäkaffa's mother Maryamawit, 243 miniatures; BritLib Orient. 607, executed between 1730–50 for aṣe ↗Iyasu II and ətege Məntəwwab (↗Bərhan Mogäsa), 260 miniatures; Windsor Castle, Eth. 4, executed for a certain Yonakəndis and his wife Yodit, 159 folios, "with few exceptions there are pictures on every page" (Ullendorff 1953: 76); Gondär, ↗Däbrä Ṣ́äḥay Qʷəsqʷam, written for Məntəwwab, 245 miniatures (many unfinished); Lalibäla, Betä Maryam (B1–IV.8), donors Täklä Abib, Wäldä Kiros and Wälättä Arägay, 74 miniatures; Waynamä Kidanä Məḥrät, executed 1797/98 (present place of preservation and number of miniatures unknown); Ǝnṭoṭṭo, Kidanä Məḥrät (EMML no. 748), executed in 1913 for ras ↗Wäldä Giyorgis Abboyye and his wife Wälättä Giyorgis, over 250 miniatures; Däbrä Marqos executed for wäyzäro Laqäčč, wife of nəguś ↗Täklä Haymanot, 187 miniatures.

From the 18th cent., the ↗mäqdäs decoration of circular churches (↗Church buildings) added several scenes based on the N.M. to the set on the southern wall. Such a programme may start with the story of Mary's parents, her birth and infancy and end with the events connected to her death and Assumption (↗Ǝrgäta). Within these frames the painters depicted episodes that took place during the flight of the Holy Family from Herod's persecutions to the legendary countries and the miracles performed by her and by the Infant Jesus. The number of the scenes differs from church to church and, since many stories are also featured in other texts (Gädlä Hanna, ↗Täʾammərä Iyäsus, ↗Täʾammərä Maryam) it is not always clear if the painters used the N.M. as the textual basis. The master scheme designed by the painter Kasa for the Mission ↗Griaule in 1932 includes one episode which exclusively belongs to the N.M. cycle, but in the extensively decorated churches there may be over a dozen, as in Iyäsus Tašši, Təgray, decorated in 1964.

Similar observations are valid for the paintings on wood: e.g., of the 16 scenes depicted on the triptych Addis Abäba, IES 4114, only one based on the N.M. for certain.

Napier, Robert Cornelis

N. (b. 6 December 1810, Colombo, Ceylon, d. 14 January 1890, London) was a British officer who commanded the Anglo-Indian expedition against aṣe ↗Tewodros II (↗Napier expedition).

The son of Major Charles Frederick Napier, N. was educated at Addiscombe Military Academy in Croydon, South London. He was commissioned into the [British] Bengal Engineers in 1828, and was promoted to Captain in 1841. He participated in the First (1845–46) and Second (1848–49) Anglo–Sikh wars, being promoted to Lieutenant-colonel in 1849. N. served in the campaign against the Indian Mutiny of 1857 and in the Anglo–Chinese war of 1860. He was renowned as an authority in military engineering. In 1865 N. was appointed Commander-in-chief of the [British] Bombay army, which provided most of the personnel for the 1867/68 expedition against Tewodros, and was accordingly chosen to head it, with the rank of Lieutenant-General.

By executing the Napier expedition, N. was credited with leading a well-equipped, and militarily successful, operation, which involved setting up a base camp, and traversing difficult mountainous countryside. He was rewarded with a hereditary peerage and the title of 1st Baron Napier "of Magdala", and British streets and public-houses were named after him. Critics, however, suggested that he had deceived Tewodros by accepting a gift of cattle intended as a peace offering. N. subsequently advised the British Government on policy towards Ethiopia. In 1870, N. became Commander-in-chief in India, becoming General in 1874. From 1876 to 1883 he was appointed British governor of Gibraltar. In 1883 N. was promoted Field Marshal. The last three years of his life he had the position of the Constable of the Tower of London.

Netherlands, relations with the

As a small European country with no traditional trade, or colonial or religious links to Eastern Africa, relations of the N. with Ethiopia were very limited until after World War II. No serious travel reports on Ethiopia from the medieval or later periods are known, except the posthumous work of J.M. ↗Schuver (James et al. 1998), who explored the Sudan-Ethiopia border areas in the 1880s.

In the 16th cent. a few important works concerning Ethiopian Studies were published in the N. Among them, ↗Góis's Fides, religio moresque Aethiopum (published in Louvain in 1540) and the Evangelicae Historiae Imagines (Antwerp 1593), which included 153 engravings by Bernardino Passeri and the Dutch Marten de Vos, and Jerome and Anton Wierix. This later work was taken by the ↗Jesuits to the court of aṣe ↗Susənyos.

In the 17th cent. the Dutch-German Anna Maria van ↗Schuurman became a pioneer in the study of the ↗Gəᶜəz language. The same century also saw the first contacts with what was called "the land of the Habšis" or of ↗Prester John. Tentative trade links were explored in 1630 between the Dutch "West India Company" (WIC) and Ethiopia, which were not successful. The Dutch competitor of the WIC, the United Dutch East India Company (VOC) thwarted the WIC's efforts. Ethio-dutch contacts were furthered by ḫoğa ↗Murād, the Armenian envoy of aṣe ↗Fasilädäs and ↗Iyasu I, visiting Batavia (in the Dutch East Indies) in 1675, after having been to Mughal ↗India (cf. DonMurad 39, 61), and again in 1691 and 1697. Gifts were exchanged, such as Abyssinian wild asses, horses and slaves brought to Batavia, and cloth, spices, matchlocks, and two large church bells specially cast on the orders of the VOC's governor-general in 1689 and taken to Ethiopia (they eventually ended up in the Śəllase church in ↗Däbrä Bərhan; cf. DonMurad 1979: 84ff.). The Dutch were interested in ↗gold, ↗ivory and especially Ethiopian ↗coffee. However, profitable trade never really got off the ground because of strong competition from others.

From the early 18th up to the 20th cent. no significant relations between the N. and Ethiopia are recorded. In this period, however, a (limited) number of Ethiopian religious ↗manuscripts were acquired by various Dutch travellers and collectors, mostly deposited in Leiden University Library.

In the 1920s, Dutch Catholic ↗Lazarist missionaries started to work in Ethiopia. In the 1970s, they numbered about 35 people and worked in the capital and in the Käfa and western Oromo regions. Some of them (Lambert ↗Bartels, Jaap Zwarthoed and Ton Leus) later published valuable ethnographic works and dictionaries.

After the Italian attack on Ethiopia in 1936 (↗Italian war 1935–36), which caused indignation in the N. (in the ↗League of Nations, N. voted for sanctions and an arms embargo on Italy), several Dutch doctors participated in the ↗Red Cross mission to assist the Ethiopian war-wounded.

After the war, the Dutch company Handelsvereniging Amsterdam (HVA), active in the sugar industry in Indonesia up to independence in 1949, relocated to Ethiopia and, under imperial patronage, set up sugar factories in Wänği in 1951 and in ↗Mätähara in 1965. Though allegedly causing environmental damage, it was a successful enterprise, producing both for the domestic Ethiopian market and for export (fruits and vegetables to Europe), and at one point provided employment for ca. 7,000 Ethiopians. HVA was nationalized without compensation in 1975 by the Därg (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council). In the 1960s, the Dutch companies Philips and Shell also opened branches in Ethiopia.

A Dutch embassy was established in Ethiopia only in 1960; prior to that there had been a lower-level diplomatic mission since 1950. In 1954, Queen Juliana visited Ethiopia with her husband Prince Bernhard (Afrika Instituut 1954), and in 1969 aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I paid a return visit to the N. The Emperor also had three Dutch personal advisors, among them the lawyer and former chairman of the Council of Netherlands Indies, Mr. H.J. Spit.

In the era of the Därg regime, relations with the N. cooled significantly due to political violence and economic decline. Many Dutch expatriates left, and, in 1978, virtually all missionaries were expelled.

Ethiopia never had an embassy in the N., but maintained a consulate for a number of years in the early 2000s, when economic ties and tourism showed an upsurge.

In 2000–02, Dutch army units led the peacekeeping forces of the ↗United Nations Mission to Ethiopia and Eritrea (UNMEE); they were stationed in the demilitarized border zone after the signing of a peace agreement between the two warring countries. The mission was led by a Dutch lieutenant-colonel.

The N. maintains bilateral relations with Ethiopia and spends a comparatively high amount of development aid in the country, but in its foreign policy towards Ethiopia N. largely acts within the European Union framework. The Dutch embassy made a major effort in 2005 to assist Ethiopia with the parliamentary elections, appealing for "a level playing field" for the legitimate opposition parties. In recent years, economic relations have developed, with trade steadily growing and new Dutch flower-farm entrepreneurs active in Ethiopia.

Dutch scholarship on Ethiopia was limited due to the small number of scholars engaged; there was never a Dutch Ethiopianist tradition. The most well-known names of the older generation are the Semiticist-epigraphist Abraham Johannes ↗Drewes (s. EAE vol. 5) and the Semiticist-Arabist and historian Emeri van Donzel. A small number of scholars of a younger generation – anthropologists, historians and linguists – are also active. In the past few decades, links between the two countries grew via the higher education sector, with a growing number of Dutch M.A. and Ph.D. students doing research in Ethiopia and many Ethiopians trained in the N., although mostly in social science, agriculture and development studies and not primarily in the classical fields of ↗Ethiopian Studies.

Since the 1980s, an Ethiopian migrant community of ca. 12,000 people, mostly with a refugee background, has emerged in the N., politically critical but maintaining links with their country of origin, and some of them entering into social and business ventures as well.

Nonnosus

N. (Gr. Νόννοσος, Nónnosos, first half of the 6th cent. A.D.) was a Byzantine ambassador sent, ca. 530/31 A.D., by Emperor ↗Justinian I to the Aithíopes ('Ethiopians', ↗Aithiopía), Amerîtai ('Himyarites', ↗Ḥimyar) and Axoumîtai ('Aksumites', ↗Aksum). On returning to Constantinople, he wrote a report in Greek, with interesting observations on the habits of the tribes of ↗Arabia (including their balanced relationships with the natural environment in the south of the Arabian peninsula, s. Leontsini 2012: 375 and nn. 81–83) and a strong emphasis on his own courage during breath-taking adventures in those remote places. This work, now lost, was summarized by Patriarch Photius in the 9th cent. (Bibl. cod. III, ed. Henri 1959: 4–7), and reportedly used, though without naming its author, by the Byzantine chroniclers ↗John Malalas (XVIII, 56, ed. Thurn 2000: 384f.) and Theophanes Confessor (ad A.M. 6064 = 571/72 A.D., ed. de Boor 1883: 244f.) in the mid-6th and early 9th cent., resp.

As a matter of fact, both chroniclers preserve independently, with significant variations (more detailed in Malalas), the same lengthy eye-witness account of the reception of a Roman ambassador (sent by Emperor Justin II [565–78] in Theophanes) at the court of nəguś ↗Kaleb Ǝllä Aṣbəḥa (Aréthas, i.e. Ḥarīṯ, in Theophanes). Dressed in a linen garment embroidered with goldwork, wearing much jewellery and a precious headcloth, the king appeared in a chariot decorated with golden wreaths and raised on a wheeled platform drawn by four elephants – a remarkable attestation of the use of wheels in Aksum. The king ("of the Indians" in Malalas, cp. ↗"India" as a name of Ethiopia) stood on top of that chariot, carrying a small gilded shield and two small lances, also gilded ("golden" in Theophanes). And all his notables (lit. "his senate") were there, armed, "and flutes [were there] making music for chanting" ("[and they were] singing musical refrains" in Theophanes). The name of the ambassador is given only by Theophanes: "Julian magistrianós", i.e. agens in rebus ('imperial courier').

There had indeed been an ambassador by the name of Julian who was in Aksum towards the end of the 520s. A professional diplomat (he was the brother of Summus, head of the Roman troops in Palestine under Justinian), Julian is certainly a better candidate for the authorship of the account transmitted by Malalas and Theophanes (introduced as "given by the ambassador himself"), which could hardly embed N.'s own records. According to Procopius (Bell. I, 20, 9–12 and II, 1, 10, ed. Haury 1905: 108ff. and 149), who is the safest guide into this matter, Julian went to Aksum and Ḥimyar as a special legate of Justinian to their rulers, Ǝllä Aṣbəḥa (Ellestheaîos) and the (puppet) king or viceroy appointed by the latter, ↗Sumyafaʿ Ašwaʿ (Esim[ι]phaîos). The main aim of this mission was to see that the fugitive Imruʾ al-Qays (Káïsos), who had killed a relative of Sumyafaᶜ Ašwaᶜ, be made "captain (phýlarchon) over the Maddeni [(Banū) Maᶜadd]" following the death of Ḥarīṯ b. ᶜAmr, king of Kinda (an Arab tribe linked to Ḥimyar), in 527/28 A.D. In this respect, the mission was successful: Imruᵓ al-Qays had become already a phylarch by the time of N.'s embassy – which in no way, therefore, could be part of Julian's (pace Shahîd 1995: 157). Moreover, Julian had to establish a trade agreement by which the Roman emperor freed himself both from the interference of the Persians (↗Iran) and from the heavy duties they imposed on the merchandise – first and foremost ↗silk – owing to their fluctuating relationships with the Byzantines. In this Julian failed, unable as he was to persuade Sumyafaᶜ Ašwaᶜ and Kaleb to attack Persia and, thereby, divert the silk route to Aksum and Alexandria (↗Egypt; Irvine in DicEthBio 95).

Photius's scant summary is the only extant source of N.'s biography: he belonged to a family of successful diplomats, possibly of Semitic stock (thus with the necessary linguistic skills for Arabia), who had likewise specialized in the ↗Red Sea area. His grandfather (Euphrasius in other sources) was dispatched by Emperor Anastasius I to the aforesaid Ḥarīṯ of Kinda (Aréthas, hence his confusion with Kaleb by Theophanes), in 503 A.D., "to conclude a treaty of peace". N.'s father, Abra(ha)m (a presbyter in other sources) was sent by ↗Justin I to the "chief of the Saracens", i.e. the Laḫmid king al-Munīr (Alamoúndaros) of Ḥīra, ca. 524 A.D., to negotiate the release of Timostratus and John, "two Roman generals who were prisoners of war"; and then by Justinian I to the "chief of the two illustrious Saracen tribes, the Chindeni [Kinda] and Maadeni [Maᶜadd]", i.e. to the phylarch Imruᵓ al-Qays ("a descendant [apógonos] of Ḥarīṯ"), ca. 528/29 A.D., also to conclude "a treaty of peace", on condition that Imruᵓ al-Qays's son, Muᶜāwiya, "should be taken as a hostage to Byzantium".

N. was in turn entrusted with a twofold mission: again to Imruᵓ al-Qays, "to induce him, if possible, to visit the emperor", i.e. Justinian, who had his own designs upon him; and to the king of the Aksumites, Ǝllä Aṣbəḥa, as well as to the Ḥimyarites. No concrete evidence is available as to the scope of the latter embassies. Most probably, N. went to Aksum and Ḥimyar, then under Ethiopian suzerainty, to seek again a commercial and military alliance against the Persians, but did not succeed in his endeavours. After a second visit of Abra(ha)m, however, Imruᵓ al-Qays "set out for Byzantium, having previously divided his chieftaincy between his brothers Ambrus [ᶜAmr] and Iezidus [Yazīd]", and then became phylarch of Palestine.

These missions, marking an increase of diplomatic activity, took place during and after the events in ↗Naǧrān and the Ḥimyarite wars, that is within the framework of the struggle between Byzantium and Aksum on the one hand and Sasanian Iran on the other for the possession of South Arabia, which meant the control of the trade routes to and from ↗India.

According to Photius's summary, having reached Aksum, N. mentions that this town is "fifteen days' journey" from ↗Adulis. On his way to the Ethiopian capital, he and his companions sighted a large herd of ↗elephants, "nearly 5,000", feeding "on a large plain" (Hazamo for CRStor 226), not far from the district (chōríon) of Aui/Avi (Aúē), midway between Adulis and Aksum (cp. Schneider 1984: 169), i.e. in the ↗Käskäse area. In that zone of the highlands he also locates the Ethiopian watershed, because of "the climatic contrarieties of summer and winter between Aui and Aksum" (s. Fiaccadori 2004: 128f.). While approaching the last of the Far(a)sān islands (a former Roman military outpost in the Red Sea, some 50 km from the far southwestern shores of today's Saudi Arabia, s. Fiaccadori 2008: 448f. and n. 40), N. saw a group of Pygmies, "creatures of human shape and form, very short, black-skinned, their bodies entirely covered with hair", who "live on shell-fish and fish cast up on the shore" (s. Colin 1992). This keen description adds to the ethnographic and picturesque bias of his narrative, brought into relief by Photius, and further marks the difference from Julian's account as actually preserved by Malalas and Theophanes.

Norway, relations with

Political relations

Modern N. has a relatively short history as an independent state, gaining independence from the Union with ↗Sweden only in 1905. Thus, bilateral relations between N. and Ethiopia are equally recent. Prior to 1814, N.'s relations to Ethiopia may be subsumed under ↗Denmark, and between 1814 and 1905 under Sweden.

Interest in N. for Ethiopia, apart perhaps from occasional individual attention, is a correspondingly recent phenomenon. Aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I mentions in his autobiography (HSLife II, 22) that, after the Italian occupation of 1936, the King of N., Haakon VII, had initially written to him indicating that N. would not recognize Italy's claims over Ethiopia (↗Africa Orientale Italiana). While other countries were more reluctant to resist Italy's demands, N. accepted the British policies (↗United Kingdom, relations with). In ↗World War II N. fought on the allied side, but played no particular role in the Ethiopian campaign, being mainly involved in maritime operations and in fighting the Germany occupational force at home.

In the late 1940s, the newly formed ↗United Nations (UN) deliberated the future of the former Italian colonies in Africa, including ↗Eritrea. In 1950, after the failure of the ↗Four Power Commission, N. was appointed, together with Burma, South Africa, Guatemala and Pakistan, to serve in a fact-finding ↗United Nations Commission for Eritrea and its future status. Initially, the Norwegian representative, Justice Erling Quale, recommended that most Eritrea be reunited with Ethiopia. However, N. went along with the majority position and recommended an ↗Ethiopian–Eritrean Federation. In 1959 the retired Secretary General of the UN, the Norwegian Trygve Lie, was appointed as an arbitrator between Ethiopia and Italy on the issue of the future status of ↗Somalia. In this regard, however, the UN effort did not succeed.

In the 1950s Ḫaylä Śəllase I requested assistance from N. in establishing a ↗navy and training its officers. A first generation of Ethiopian navy cadets received their training in the fjords of western N. Furthermore, throughout the 1950s and into the 1960s, several Norwegian navy officers and their families resided in ↗Asmära and ↗Massawa, assisting and instructing the new Ethiopian navy.

In 1966, King Olav V of N. visited Ethiopia as the first Norwegian Head of State. Bilateral diplomatic relations had developed slowly throughout the 1960s, with the exchange of consular services. A Norwegian Embassy was established in ↗Addis Abäba as late as 1994 with a Charge d'affaires, and, since 1995, with an Ambassador. Prior to the establishment of the Embassy, the resident representative of the Norwegian Church Aid (NCA) also served as Consul to Ethiopia. Ethiopia's diplomatic accreditation to N. is served by an ambassador residing in Sweden.

Private Norwegian investments in Ethiopia are not large. Since the 1950s, the shipping company Mosvold ran a department store in Addis Abäba, and the paint manufacturer Alf Bjerke constructed a factory for paint production in the outskirts of the capital. More recently Norsk Hydro (reorganized and named Yara in 2004), one of the largest chemical fertilizer concerns in the world, has become involved in the Ethiopian market. In 2005, the Yara foundation caused a heated debate by bestowing its newly founded "Green Revolution Price Award" on Prime Minister ↗Mälläs Zenawi (s. EAE vol. 5), for inter alia his work on food security in Ethiopia.

Missionary activities

Norwegian missionaries have been working in Ethiopia since around 1949, when the Norwegian ↗mission to China was closed down and the missionaries were re-deployed to the Horn of Africa. There they joined Swedish and ↗German Lutheran missionaries who had been serving in ↗Wälläga and other more remote provinces since the end of 19th cent. Emperor Ḫaylä Śəllase I welcomed both Protestant and Catholic missionaries as long as they did not attempt to proselytize among Orthodox Christians. Norwegian missionary activities were mainly centred around the establishment of hospitals, schools and, later, agricultural and community development projects, in cooperation with the newly established ↗Ethiopian Evangelical Church Mekane Yesus (EECMY). The Norwegian missionaries, mostly as priests but also in a social capacity advised and assisted the development of the EECMY. The Norwegian mission remained in Ethiopia during the military regime; later it became clear that some missionaries had passed on information to the international community concerning gross human rights violations during the Därg era (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council). The Norwegian mission is represented in Ethiopia today inter alia through the Norwegian Lutheran Mission and the Norwegian Missionary Society.

Aid, social and advocacy assistance

Redd Barna (Save the Children) was the first large Norwegian NGO to open a major project in Ethiopia around 1970. In projects aimed at strengthening the livelihood and the survival capacity of rural households, they attempted to improve the situation of children. NCA came to Ethiopia in an effort to alleviate the ↗famine of 1973–74. Later, relations with the military regime became strained, mainly due to NCA's efforts to assist famine-struck Eritrea/northern Ethiopia in the mid-1980s, through cross-border operations from the Sudan. NCA was the leading agency in a consortium of western church-based NGOs – through the Emergency Relief Desk programme – which channelled huge amounts of relief aid and logistical support to the Eritrean and later Təgrayan populations affected by famine, using the operations of the ↗Eritrean Peoples' Liberation Front's (EPLF) humanitarian agency Eritrean Relief Association (ERA) and the ↗Tigray People's Liberation Front's (TPLF) Relief Society of Təgray (REST). The assistance to ERA and REST, coordinated by the NCA continued and increased during the 1980s, until the military regime collapsed in 1991. EPLF representatives later stated that the assistance of the NCA was crucial in shortening the war of resistance against the military regime by several years. Although the aid channelled to ERA and REST was earmarked to help the civilian population, a considerable share of it was used by the EPLF and TPLF to back their war efforts. For instance, large shares of the protein biscuit given as emergency relief aid to the famine-struck populations – popularly called "Norway biscuit" in Eritrea – was diverted and used as combat food for the EPLF/TPLF fighters. There are indications that the Norwegian authorities were aware of, and supported, this use of the relief/development aid given to the EPLF/TPLF. Although the military regime was extremely annoyed by the NCA's cross-border activity in northern Ethiopia, the NCA maintained its presence and its office in Addis Abäba, and tried several times to negotiate between the parties in the conflict.

The close relations established between the NCA and the EPLF and TPLF leadership during the resistance struggle was later utilized by NCA and N. authorities in their work towards the political leadership of the Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) and the EPLF. For instance, after 1991, the NCA among others attempted to assist the democratization process in Ethiopia through democracy and voter training programmes and by offering its services to facilitate dialogue between the government and opposing groups. Furthermore, after the outbreak of the 1998–2000 war between Ethiopia and Eritrea, the NCA brought together the heads of the four major religious communities in the countries, to try to reconcile the effects of the war. Other Norwegian NGOs, academic institutions and official authorities assisted in similar efforts. N. has supported the Ethiopian National Electoral Board in building its technical and institutional capacity, while Norwegian researchers have observed and followed all elections conducted in Ethiopia since 1992.

Ethiopia was elevated to the category of a principal development partner with Norway in 1998, and an increase in bilateral development aid was foreseen. However, due to the outbreak of the Eritrean–Ethiopian war in 1998 and the worsened human rights situation in the country, this status was immediately downgraded to "ordinary partner country". Thereafter official N. aid to Ethiopia has concentrated on: peace, reconciliation and stability on the one hand, and good governance, human rights and democracy on the other.

At the past and present time, N. hosts communities of Ethiopian and Eritrean refugees and political asylum seekers. Since the Revolution of 1974, a growing number of political refugees sought asylum in Scandinavia, and N. has continued to accept its share.

Nubia

N., in Egyptological and Nubiological terms, is the middle ↗Nile region from Aswān (↗Egypt) to an undetermined point to the south of ↗Khartoum (central ↗Sudan). It includes in the east and west the adjoining desert and steppes, and encompasses different landscapes, climates, vegetation, people, languages and cultures. Internally, riverine N. is divided into Lower N., between the 1st and 2nd Nile cataracts, and Upper N., south of the 2nd cataract up to south of Khartoum.

It is commonly assumed that the most ancient mention of the Noûbai, '↗Noba, Nubians', occurs in Eratosthenes, apud ↗Strabo, Geogr. XVII, 1, 2 p. 786C. (= fr. IIIB 51 Berger), but contemporary, if not older, is a spurious fragment of Apollodorus preserved by Constantine Porphyrogenitus: "Nubians [Noúbēs (Noûbai)], people of Libya near the Nile" (FGrH 244 F 330); and the reference to Nubaei, 'Nubians', in ↗Pliny, Nat. hist. VI, 35, 192, depends on Bio of Soli (prior to Eratosthenes). ↗Ptolemy, Geogr. IV, 7, 30, yields more accurate information on Noûbai as neighbours of Molíbai and Megábardoi, as well as, IV, 6, 16, on an homonymous people in the southern parts of Numidia. In the late antique and Byzantine periods, the usual designations for "Nubians" were Nobátai, Nobadae and other such names. In the Greek sources, at least until the ↗Monumentum Adulitanum (RIÉ 277), the Nubian and namely Meroitic (↗Meroë) area was generically labelled as ↗Aithiopía (s. Fiaccadori 2004: 117, 125ff.). In later Arabic sources, beside Nūba (of Greek origin), the equally vague bilād as-Sūdān, 'land of the Blacks', is frequently attested – after which the political entity was named that developed out of the 1821 Turco-Egyptian conquest. Today's autonomous country of Sudan took its name directly from that.

The archaeological time span ranges from the Palaeolithic to the end of the medieval period (ca. 1500 A.D.). Since most of the Nubian cultures were illiterate and Meroitic is still practically unintelligible (Rilly 2004), the internal chronology of the different Nubian cultures is correlated to Egyptian chronology, owing to the interconnections of both entities: i.e. Egyptian texts concerning N. (usually referred to as Ta-Sti, 'Land of the Bow', a clear hint at the most common weapon there) and Egyptian finds in N. as well as Nubian finds in Egypt, there being some ^{14}C-dates, but partly rather inconclusive.

Notable is the accelerated development of a stratified society early in the 5th millenium B.C. at Kadruka (Upper N.) long before similar developments are noted in Egypt (Reinold 2000: 58ff.). While a stratified chiefdom, named ↗Kush in texts from the Middle Kingdom onwards, was already developing at Kerma (ca. 2500–1500 B.C.) in the Upper N. ↗Dongola district during the Egyptian Old Kingdom, the communities of Lower N. remained largely egalitarian (A-Group, ca. 3800–3000 B.C., C-Group ca. 2300–1500 B.C.). Their relationships with Egypt are shown by texts and findings. Originating in the Eastern desert and Red Sea hills, the Pan grave culture, diffused up to ↗Kassala (Sadr 1987; 1990), is documented in Lower N. and Upper Egypt from the beginning of the second millennium. It has been associated with the "Medjaiu" who appear first in Egyptian texts of the 6th dynasty (but s. Liszka 2012) and should be identified, on linguistic grounds, with modern ↗Beğa (El-Sayed 2004; 2011; Zibelius-Chen 2011), the latter being one and the same as late-antique ↗Blemmyes (Browne 2003). They served the Egyptians as scouts and mercenaries up to the New Kingdom, where they participated in the campaigns against N., but also fighted on the side of the Nubians (Kushites) when these invaded Upper Egypt towards the end of the Second Intermediate Period (ca. 1794–1550 B.C.) – with allies also consisting of Lower Nubians und Puntites (↗Punt, s. Davies 2003).

The development of N. was strongly influenced throughout all periods by Egyptian interests, which aimed at the free disposal of Nubian wealth, especially gold, aromatics, other natural resources, human labourers and soldiers. N. was also the passage through which such exotic African goods as ebony, ivory, incense and ostrich feathers and eggshells reached Egypt, adding to N.'s share in world ↗trade. After the annexation of Lower N. (in part already during the Old Kingdom), the Egyptian pharaohs campaigned during the Middle Kingdom against Kush, but were unable to subdue this kingdom, which had become a powerful rival of Egypt. Kush extended then from the 2nd cataract to south of the 4th cataract, with its political and commercial centre at Kerma. A palace, administrative and religious buildings, especially the Western deffufa (lit. 'mudbrick'), an imposing temple structure of 50 x 25 m and still almost 20 m high, and a necropolis of enormous, richly endowed tumulus tombs for the rulers and large cult chapels, notably the Eastern deffufa, have been excavated (Bonnet – Valbelle 2000; Iid. 2004). As during the Second Intermediate Period (ca. 1794–1550 B.C.) the unified Egyptian state disintegrated and its garrisons withdrew from the forts in Lower N., the Asiatic Hyksos established themselves in the Eastern delta and extended their dominion over Middle Egypt. Kush quickly filled the vacuum left by the Egyptians, reaching up to the border with Egypt at Elephantine. According to Egyptian texts, the Hyksos made an alliance with the ruler of Kush in order to conquer and divide Egypt. Yet, they were expelled and the Kushite threat was eliminated by a lasting war of nearly 90 years. Kush was destroyed and the whole territory of N. annexed up to Ḥağar al-Marwa (Kurgus) in the Abū Ḥāmid district, between the 4th and 5th cataracts. A colonial regime was enforced, an Egyptian administration installed and a considerable number of temples for Egyptian deities was erected (Fowles Morris 2005).

After 500 years of rule, at the end of the New Kingdom (ca. 1080 B.C.), the Egyptians left eventually N. Native elite tombs from the late New Kingdom and the Third Intermediate Period were recently discovered at Hillat al-ᶜArab, slightly south of Ğabal Barkal, next to the 4th cataract (Vincentelli 2006). In this region, at al-Kurrū, a local centre of power developed again ca. 850 B. C. (Kendall 1999) that later moved to ↗Napata, at Ğabal Barkal, and shortly afterwards was able to extend its control to Lower N. and Upper Egypt (Thebes). By his 21st year of reign, King Piankhi (ca. 753–722 B.C.) had established his rule over the whole of Egypt, initiating here the Napatan (Kushitic) 25th or ↗Ethiopian dynasty.

The attempts of the Kushites to return were averted by the kings of the 26th dynasty and stopped after Psammeticus II, who apparently reached Napata on his campaign in 593 B.C. Later on, struggles over Lower N. and influence on Upper Egypt were to produce frequent military actions with Ptolemaic and Roman troops in Lower N.

For its some 400 years of history little is known of the Napatan kingdom after its withdrawal from Egypt, apart from kings' and queens' names occuring on the archaeological remains of temples and pyramid tombs that continued to be erected. Only a few, more informative texts written in Egyptian have been transmitted (Török 1997; Welsby 1996). From the middle of the 5th cent. B.C., the centre shifted from Napata southwards to Meroë, between the 5th and 6th cataracts, where the kingdom developed more distinctive local features and kept flourishing alongside and contemporary to Ptolemaic and Roman Egypt.

At the beginning of the 2nd cent. B.C., Egyptian writing changed to native Meroitic. This being as yet poorly understood, some knowledge about historical events is derived from external, chiefly classical, sources. Apparently associated with a more aggressive northern policy, which led to the Meroitic conquest and pillage of Philae and Syene (Aswān) a conflict with the Romans was provoked, resulting in Petronius's campaign of 23 B.C. (Monneret de Villard 1938: 7–15). After the peace of Samos 21/20 B.C., the Romans withdrew their garrison from Primis Parva (later Qaṣr Ibrīm), while the Meroites had to acknowledge the border at today's Maḥarraqa in Lower N.

Strabo's passage on the campaign against ↗Candace, "a masculine sort of woman, and blind in one eye" (Geogr. XVII, 1, 54 p. 820 C. = FHN 190), puts into a more realistic perspective the triumphal narrative of Augustus' Res gestae (§26 = FHN 166). A few Latin ↗inscriptions provide actual evidence for diplomatic relations between Rome and Meroë (e.g., FHN 220 [CIL III 14148]). Remarkably, in 60/61 A.D., Emperor Nero sent informers to sound the political feelings of the Nubians. In the late 1st/early 2nd cent. A.D., the poet Juvenal makes it evident that N. was no more a fabulous land at the end of the known world, but a well-defined place in Roman culture and imagination: he introduces matronae "journey(ing) to the confines of Egypt, and fetch(ing) water from hot Meroë with which sprinkle the temple of Isis" in Rome (Sat. VI, 526ff.). Only in 297 A.D. did Diocletian move the frontier back to Syene, but exactly how the Romans ruled Lower N. and the degree to which the Meroites may have been involved cannot be established.

The fall of Meroë, in which the Noba (Noûbai), originating in the south-west, seem to have also played a rôle, is usually dated between 350 and 370 A.D., but it should have occurred quite earlier, between 260 and 269, the last reference to an independent Nubian state and king (Teqorideamani) going back to 254 A.D. (s. Fiaccadori 2004: 116f. and Zach 2011). Meroë would have then been abandoned, the pyramid no. 25 representing the last burial in the royal necropolis of Beg(e)rawiya (Bağarāwiya) north at Meroë. Meroitic rule was succeeded in the north by the Ballaña culture (X-Group), with royal necropoles at Ballaña and Qusṭul (4th–6th cent. A.D.; s. Török 1987), and the post-Meroitic Period in the south with regional traditions displaying "imperial" burials with contents of considerable wealth, also showing military prowess by their weaponry (Lenoble 1989; 1999). This was a transitional period during which the Noba seem to have settled in the south and the No(u)bádes and Blemmyes in the north as new inhabitants of the Nile valley. It was also a period of unrest in Lower N., since the middle 5th-cent. Nobadian ruler Silkō left a Greek inscription in the temple of Kalabsha, where he styles himself as basilískos, '(federate) king' (vs. the ↗Byzantine Empire), and records three campaigns, by which he seems to have defeated the Blemmyes (FHN 317).

While Greek was, besides Coptic, the main official (written) language (Łajtar 2003; van der Vliet 2003), these Nubian speakers brought with them their dialects (Bechhaus-Gerst 1996), which were vital in forming the new identity of the medieval Christian kingdoms of N. (Welsby 2002; Edwards 2004: 212–55).

↗Christianity formally came to N. in the 6th cent. A.D., but may have been present long before (Monneret de Villard 1938: 61–70). The most ancient historical document is the N.T. narrative (Act. 8, 26 = FHN 194) on an "Ethiopian [Aithíops] man", said to be the "powerful eunuch [eunoûchos dynástēs]" of Queen Candace who was converted by Philip the Deacon in Palestine (the Jewish diaspora had likewise affected, conversely, the Nubian territories). Ancient sources have it that the eunuch began to preach Christianity immediately after returning to his homeland (Ireneus, Contra haer. IV, 23, 2; Eusebius, Hist. eccl. II, 1, 13 = FHN 294). The Coptic Life of Apa Aaron (Budge 1915: 445–93) informs that Macedonius was appointed as the first bishop of Philae in the 4th cent. A.D.; he was assisted by three acolytes, Mark, Isaia and Pseleusius. An interesting document on a Christian community harassed by repeated attacks of the nearby heathens (i.e. the Blemmyes) is the petition by Appion, bishop of Syene, to the Emperors Theodosius II and Valentinianus III (FHN 314 [P. Leiden Z. SB2014606]).

The first official effort for spreading Christianity in the region dates to the age of ↗Justinian I, when the presbyter Julian, a protégé of Empress Theodora and a strong supporter of ↗Monophysitism, was sent there between 542 and 545 – probably with the help of the Alexandrian patriarch Theodosius, according to John of Ephesus (Hist. eccl. IV, 6–9, cp. Scholz 2010). Julian stayed among the Nubians two years, christening the king and the aristocracy. Before leaving, he entrusted the young Christian community to Bishop Theodore, whom Patriarch Timothy III had appointed to the see of Philae (an island in the 1st Nile cataract, marking the southernmost limit of Egypt) in 525 A.D.; there, a Greek inscription in the temple of Isis commemorates Theodore turning that pagan building into a place of Christian worship dedicated to St. Stephen (Lefebvre 1907, no. 587.2–5 = FHN 324). After Julian, Bishop Longinus, also a Monophysite, was appointed to succeed him in charge of the Nubian mission. Neither this mission nor the strong influences from the emerging Coptic Church ever resulted in the utter exclusion of Greek Orthodoxy (i.e. Dyophysitism). It was not before 569 A.D., however, that Longinus arrived in Nubia; he was active until about 580, eventually preaching the Gospel in the southern kingdom of Alodia. Here, actually, he had been preceeded by a group of "Phantasiasts" or followers of Julian of Halicarnassus (↗Julianism) coming from ↗Aksum (Fiaccadori 1992: 13 n. 33).

As a matter of fact, very little is known as to the relationships Meroë or Kasu and its large but probably loosely controlled area of influence entertained with their powerful eastern neighbour, Aksum – as directly alluded to in ↗Heliodorus' Aithiopiká. Before the rise of Aksum, there is good evidence of commercial and political contacts between N. and the ↗Horn of Africa (s. Hatke 2013). Fragmentary Greek inscriptions and a few ↗Gəʿəz graffiti from Meroë (RIÉ 286 = FHN 285 [SEG XLII 1655*]; RIÉ 286A = FHN 286 [SEG XLII 1656]) and ↗Kawa may indicate that Aksumite campaigns reached there (Fiaccadori 2004: 125f.). When King ↗ʿEzana led his successful expedition to the Nile (DAE 11 = RIÉ 189), the Meroitic kingdom, with no maritime outlet but the port of ↗Adulis (indeed open to the "Trogodytes" of Meroë), had probably ceased to exist long before (ibid. 116f., 124f.; Id. 2009–10: 200f., 206 for the inland routes between N. and Aksum and the relevant sources). The Kasu, i.e. the remnants of the Meroitic state, and its successors, the Noba, were the target of ʿEzana's expedition, also in support of such local people as Mangurtô, ↗Barya (i.e. ↗Nara) and Ḫasa (↗Hazo) who had invoked his help to check Noba ambitions. Both Noba and Kasu, together with Beğa, officially feature in ʿEzana's titulature as comprising part of his realm (MHAksum 54, 227f.)

Three Nubian kingdoms did actually form in the early Middle Ages (ca. 500 A.D.): Nobatia in the north with its capital at Faras, (ancient Pachōras), Mak(o)uria (Muqurra) in the middle with its capital at Old Dongola (Dunqula), and Alodia (ʿAlwā) in the south with its capital at Soba (↗Soba Noba, s. EAE vol. 5; Welsby – Daniels 1991; cp. already Zyhlarz 1943 and Munro-Hay 1982–83). Like the Egyptian Copts and the Ethiopians, they adhered to the Monophysite doctrine and remained Christians for about a thousand years, being protected from Islamization (↗Islam) by the baqṭ, a bilateral treaty that guaranteed the sovereignty of N., after the Arabs had tried twice, but in vain, to conquer N. in 642 and 652 A.D (s. Spaulding 1995).

Nobatia, later called Marīs, was soon absorbed into Makuria or "Great(er) N.", and administered by an official called eparch (Nubian: soŋoj), information about the social structure of the kingdom usually deriving from Christian tombstones. Nobiin, the language of the northern part of the kingdom came to be the written language (Old Nubian) by the 8th cent. besides Greek and Coptic. A still Greek-speaking "king of Nubia" went on pilgrimage to Jerusalem and Santiago de Compostela (Galicia, northwestern Spain) via Constantinopole, where he met Emperor Alexius III in 1203, on the eve of the Fourth Crusade (s. Fiaccadori in VarAeth).

The majority of texts concerning N. are, however, little informative, being of religious nature. Historical facts, for instance, have to be retrieved from external, i.e. Greek, Latin and mostly Arabic, sources (for the latter s. Vantini 1975), in which N. is often confused with Ethiopia (Aithiopía, Aethiopia and ↗Ḥabaša), both being also styled as India (s. ↗"India" as name of Ethiopia"). These sources as well as the various archaeologically documented fortified settlements and forts testify to considerable unrest. A significant number of churches was erected that frequently display impressive wall paintings, such as in Faras (Michałowski 1974); there were also several monasteries, which like the churches were partly built or rebuilt well down the late Middle Ages (Monneret de Villard 1935–57).

Although there is to date no evidence from the Nubian side, at least loose contacts seem to have been maintained with medieval Ethiopia, since in the History of the Patriarchs (↗Severus of Ašmūnayn) it is noted that during the patriarchate of Philotheus (979–1003) King George II of N. interceded in Alexandria on behalf of the Ethiopian king requesting a new metropolitan (↗P̣ap̣pas), the regularly appointed one having been deposed under illegal circumstances (MHAksum 101; cp., in general, Tedeschi 1967–68). On the other hand, Nubian suggestions can be detected in Ethiopian art and culture (↗Art in EAE vol. 5): e.g., in the iconography of the Holy ↗Trinity (cp. ↗Trinity in art) and the use and representation of headgears or crowns with horns (s. ↗Painting; ChojPaint 344f. and n. 28; Zurawski 1993 and 1998; Martens-Czarnezca 1999; Fiaccadori 2009–10: 200f., 206ff.). Ca. 1338 the monk ↗Ewosṭatewos of Däbrä Ṣärabi, after crossing the countries of the Bogos (↗Bilin) and the Red and Black ↗Marya, reached into the land of the "Noba", ruled by a Christian king named Säbᵓa Nol in the local language, Wəludä Ityop̣ya ('Son/Posterity of Ethiopia [i.e. Nubia?]') in Gəᶜəz, and moved thence on to Egypt.

Gradually, Christianity declined in N. because of the loosening of contacts with Alexandria, the seat of the patriarch. As a rule, bishops and other church officials were in fact sent from the Greek and Coptic Patriarchates, the Nubians lacking institutions for educating high clergy. Besides, Arabs immigrated and intermarried with local women and several kings also became Muslim, so that finally Islām took over.

The ruler of ᶜAlwā remained Christian until 1504, when his reign was defeated and his kingdom subsumed into the ↗Funǧ sultanate of ↗Sinnār. At that time, Makuria was destabilized by dynastic struggles and repeated incursions of nomadic Ǧuhaniyya Arabs raiding and bringing anarchy, as well as by heavy Egyptian interventions into Nubian politics. Makuria disintegrated and part of it may have survived in the kingdom of Dotawo – with a strong imprint of Greek (Byzantine) culture. At last with the emergence of the ↗Ottomans, Christian N. ceased definitely to exist ca. 1560.

Long divided between Egypt and Sinnār, N. witnessed the progressive Arabization of much of its population. It was again united within Ottoman Egypt, in the 19th century, and Anglo–Egyptian Sudan, from 1899 to 1956. In the 1970s, many Egyptian Nubians were forcibly resettled to make room for Lake Nasser, a vast reservoir between Egypt and Sudan resulting from the construction of the subsequent dams at Aswān. As part of the world cultural heritage, several ancient monuments of N. (including the temples of Philae) were then saved from the rising waters of the lake and moved to higher ground and/or relocated nearby under the auspices of UNESCO.

O

Ophir

O. is a country mentioned in the O.T. (Heb. 1 Kgs 9:28, 10:11, 22:48; 1 Chr 29:4; 2 Chr 8:18; Is 13:12; Ps 45:10 [Eng. 45:9]; Job 22:24, 28:16) and on a pottery sherd dated to the end of the period of the kings in Israel. According to these sources, King ↗Solomon imported gold, exotic wood and precious stones from O. The expeditions to O. and the equally obscure Taršîš were carried out by Phoenician sailors, who started their journeys from the ports of Eloṯ (mod. Elaṯ) and ᶜEṣyon Geber, both in the mouth of the Gulf of ᶜAqaba. In 1 Kgs 10:11, the expedition to O. – headed by the Phoenician Hiram, responsible for a series of ↗trade missions in 1 Kgs 9 – is connected with the gifts Solomon received from the Queen of Sheba (↗Makədda). In early modern history, O. was taken as a materialisation of the ideal state or utopia.

In the Gəᶜəz ↗Bible, O. the son of Joktan, mentioned in Gen 10:28–29 is attested as ሑፋር (Ḥufar; in the LXX Ουφιϱ, Ouphir). The land of O. appears as ኤፌራ (Efera) in 3 Kgs (= Heb. 1 Kgs) 22:48; as ኦፍር (Ofər), አፌር (Afer), አፍር (Afər) in Job 28:16 (Gr. Ωφιϱ, Ōphir); as ኦፋር (Ofar) in Gregory's Epistle. In Eth. 3 Kgs (= LXX 1 Kgs) 9:28 and 10:11, O. appears as ሶፌራ (Sofera), ሶፌር (Sofer), respectively, in correspondence with the LXX renderings Σωφηϱα (Sōphēra), Σουφιϱ (Souphir); and in Job 22:24 as ሰፍር (Säfər; yet Ωφιϱ, Ōphir, in the LXX). O. does not appear in Ps 44:11 (= Heb. 45:9; already not in the LXX). ሳፊር (Safir, "Saphir"), the city built "with stones of gold" mentioned in the Ethiopic apocryphal text on the Conflict of Adam and Eve with Satan (Gädlä ↗Addam), should also be identified with O. (Dillmann 1853: 117 and n. 125 p. 142). As a matter of fact, in antiquity, the name "Saphir" was a synonym for ↗India: it is there, "in the place called before Sophira and now land of Chrysē", that Josephus Flavius places O.; and in some Arabic Bible translations O. was in fact rendered as al-Hind, 'India' (s., e.g., Peters 1899: 46f.). O. is also mentioned in Book 1 of the ↗Qälemənṭos, which closely follows its Vorlage, the Kitāb al-maǧāll, in its turn heavily drawing on the Conflict of Adam and Eve (Grébaut 1913: 56). In Is 13:12, O. (Σουφειϱ, Soupheir, or Σουφιϱ, Souphir, in the LXX) is rendered with ሰንፔር (Sänper), actually 'sapphire' (DillmLex 375; cp. Ex 24:10, 28:18; and also, e.g., the Vita of ↗Giyorgis of Sägla, Colin 1987: 4 [text]), possibly the result of a mistranslation.

O. has been localized in such different regions as Armenia, Eastern Africa, South Africa, India, Ceylon, Malaysia (with the peninsula of Malacca), and even Australia, New Zealand or South America: most likely, however, it is to be sought somewhere on the ↗Red Sea coast, possibly in South ↗Arabia (s. Görg 1981) or in Somalia (UllBible 8); or also in the border areas between Egypt and Ethiopia (Sinnār, Fazoġli, or even the region of ↗Adulis; s. Hermann 1939: 647f.). The "gold of O." and the "topaz of Ethiopia (↗Kush)" are mentioned in the same connection in Job 28:16–19, making it possible that both were results of the same expedition to O. Some scholars have suggested associating O. with ↗Punt (Baker 1992: 27; Kitchen 1997: 144; cp. De Romanis 1996: 83).

ዓፈራ (ᶜ*Afära*, here, though, possibly 'Africa' rather than 'O.', in vars. also ዓረፋ, ᶜ*Aräfa*, Dillmann 1859: 36) is also attested in the Ethiopic Book of ↗Jubilees (8:15) as part of Shem's lot. The toponym "Afrā" appears on an ancient Phoenician-Hebrew map as the East-African province of the land of Eden, placed itself in Arabia. If "Afrā" stands here for O. this may be a hint that the Biblical land of O. was the coastal strip of the African Red Sea from Eritrea to Bāb al-Mandab (Hermann 1939: 648). Conti Rossini (CRStor 48f.) proposed identifying O. with Maᶜafir in South Arabia.

↗Franchetti (1930) recorded a tradition, according to which the inhabitants of Danakil descended from O., and the name "↗ᶜAfar" is a distortion of O. (quoted in PollEr 248f.). Others (beginning, e.g., with Krapf 1860: 21), assumed instead that it was the name O. that was derived from the Cushitic ethnonym.

Scholars seeking for proof that the ↗Betä Ǝsraᵓel may indeed descend from Solomonic Israel have suggested that their ancestors were exiled or deported to O. by ↗Solomon, in exchange for large quantities of gold (Herrmann 1939: 648f.).

Oromo Liberation Front

The OLF (Orom. Adda Bilisummaa Oromoo [ABO]) is a political organization struggling for the "cultural emancipation" and "self-determination" of the ↗Oromo people in Ethiopia.

In its founding period the OLF stood for a loose network which embraced various legacies of political activity among the Oromo, and which had developed since the 1960s. The legacies included the civic and cultural activities of the ↗Mäč̣č̣a and Tulama Association (1963–67); the peasant-based Bale uprising (1963–69), and its ↗Somali-sponsored revival since 1975; the largely ↗Harär-based and periodically Somali-sponsored (1960–69) organization called the Western Somali Liberation Front (WSLF) which was re-launched in 1971 as the Ethiopian National Liberation Front (ENLF). Its office in Damascus was using the term OLF as early as 1973. The network included Oromo activists within the Ethiopian student's movement, notably a group represented by ↗Baro Tumsa. During the initial period of the Därg (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council), later activists were engaged in two strongly connected organizations. As ECCAT (Revolutionary Struggle of the Ethiopian Oppressed [RSEO]) in 1976–77, they were part of the People's Office for Mass Organizational Affairs (POMOA), the civil Marxist-Leninist consultancy board of the Därg. At the same time an umbrella organization, the Oromo Organizations People's Liberation Struggle (OOPLS), claimed to coordinate political activities among the Oromo. In 1976 former ENLF activist šeek Jaaraa (Abdulkarīm Ibrāhīm Ḥāmid) was declared military commander of the OLF. In 1977 Magarsa Barii, a deputy administrator of Bale, became chairman of the different wings of the OLF (Zitelmann 1994: 82ff.).

At the core of ECCAT's interests stood the peasant issue, under the slogan "land to the tiller", which made the headlines with the land reform of 1976 (Noggo 1978). In 1978 ECCAT broke with the Därg. Some urban cadres, including Baro Tumsa, escaped to the ↗Gara Muläta mountains, into territory controlled by šeek Jaaraa. The tragic death of Baro Tumsa was never cleared up and this spoiled relations between the two wings of the OLF. In 1986 šeek Jaaraa renamed his wing as the Islamic Front for the Liberation of Oromiya (IFLO; Zitelmann 1993: 48). To escape from a too narrow linkage with Somalia, which in 1978 had invaded Ethiopia and which had sponsored the Somali Abbo Liberation Front (SALF) under Waqoo Gutu, the ECCAT wing of the OLF opened an office for external relations in Khartoum in 1978. After Magarsa Barii was killed by Somali units in 1980, the office for external relations became the OLF's sole representative. The OLF's organizational structures copied the Ethiopian People's Liberation Front (EPLF) and the ↗Tigray People's Liberation Front (TPLF), with a political body, a military structure, mass organizations (students, workers, women, youth) and relief work among refugees (the Oromo Relief Association [ORA]), however, on a much smaller and less hierarchic, and on less cohesive and less repressive scale than practiced by the EPLF and the TPLF (Zitelmann 1995: 250). Up to the early 1980s, a Marxist-Leninist approach to national liberation was still at the core of the OLF's ideology (OLF 1979). At that stage OLF politics were presented as the continuation of the land reform by other means (Zitelmann 2009: 282). These policies gradually took the form of micro-nationalism and culturally mediated identity politics, putting territory (Oromiyaa), the ↗Oromo language, and romanticizised elements of the Oromo past (notably the age- and generation grading ↗gadaa system with its electional procedures) into its ideological core (Gadaa Melbaa 1980; 1981; Zitelmann 1990; 1997). The polemics against Ethiopian "settler colonialism" in Oromo territories, with the ↗näftäñña as the archetype of imperial power, shifted from a structural attempt to describe class-relations to describing "the Amhara" as the ethnified enemy-other (Zitelmann ibid.).

During the 1980s the OLF's fighting force increased from a few hundred to about 8,000 fighters in early 1991. During 1991–92 numbers possibly rose to 20,000–30,000, but with no corresponding military leadership and logistics. When the OLF joined the transitory government in 1991, they could rely on the professional skills of former ECCAT cadres, who served as ministers, but they had no equivalent fighting force to challenge the TPLF's grasp for total power (Zitelmann 1993; 1995: 249).

During the 1980s the OLF's structures became crucial to the cultural self-assertion among Oromo, which culminated in the concept of 'Oromo culture' (aadaa oromoo) as a trait shared by all (Zitelmann 1994: 171f.). This was strongly supported by the use of the Oromo language as a means of literacy in the Latin script (qubee), and as a means of daily intercourse. Initially the OLF's literacy program had an impact only on Oromo refugee communities in the Horn of Africa (Somalia, Sudan) and the wider ↗diaspora (Middle East, Europe, North America), but with the OLF's participation in the Ethiopian transitory government in 1991 it also began to shape internal practices in the newly formed Oromiyaa Regional State (Mohammed Hassen 1996: 261ff.; Zitelmann 1996). The introduction of qubee remains a continuous legacy.

Since 1992 OLF structures survive in memory and in exile, occasionally recalled for well-meaning attempts to improve the dismal state of democracy in the Federal Republic of Ethiopia (Lata 2004; Pausewang 2009) or for "reinventing the movement" (Shinn 2009: 3).

By the end of the first decade of the 21st cent. the OLF appears to be split into three (Shinn 2009: 3). After three decades, observers are still puzzled by the question what the OLF and its quest for self-determination of the Oromo stands for: an independent Oromiyaa or autonomy within Ethiopia (Shinn 2009: 2). Attempts by parts of the ethnic nationalist OLF to join forces with Ethiopian nationalist-centralist opponents of Ethiopia's ruling Ethiopian People's Revolutionary Democratic Front (EPRDF) underline such questions (Pausewang 2007). However, the ambiguities in the political demands, practices and semantics of Oromo liberation have been issues ever since the OLF came into being in 1974 (Zitelmann 1993: 51f.; 1994: 55ff.).

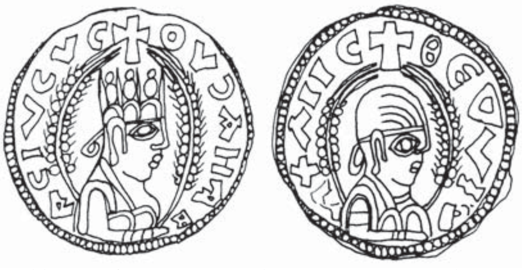
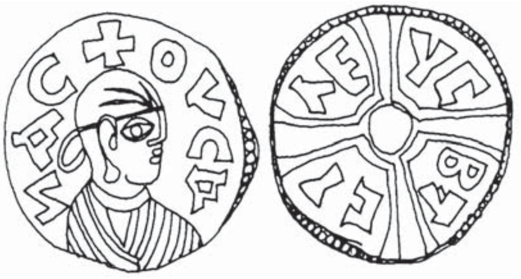
OUSANA(S) II

Ou. (Gr. OYCANA[C], i.e. *Οὐσανᾶ[ς], Ousanâ[s]), to be distinguished from ↗Ousas (s. EAE vol. 5) with whom he is occasionally identified (by taking the latter name as an abbreviation of the former, s. Godet 1986: 192f. and Breyer 2012: 41), is a Christian king of ↗Aksum of the late 5th/early 6th cent., possibly a predecessor of ↗Kaleb (if not his father ↗Tazena: s. MHAksum 83f., 88), with whose coins those of Ou. show close similarities. In the scholarly tradition counting ↗Ousanas I and Ou. II as successors of ↗Aphilas and ↗ʿEzana resp., he is referred to as Ous(an)a(s) III (s. Hahn 1984a: 131, 1984b: 177, 2000a: 288, 295ff., 309 and 2000b: 65). Yet, apart from the implied equation to Ousas, it can be now more safely assumed that there was only one namesake king, the brother and predecessor of ʿEzana (Ousanas I).

Ou. is known only from his ↗coinage. He is mentioned on a number of gold pieces recently increased by the discovery of the hoard of al-Maḍāriba (some 70 km west of Aden). On both sides, with beaded outer border and cross at top, the king appears in half-length bust facing rightwards, wearing a triple-element tiara or a head cloth resp., with a rounded fillet tied behind; the bust reaches the base of the coin. His figure, robed in a garment with the right section of the v-neck band forwards to meet the upcurve of the neckband above the hand (in a few instances, with a projecting upper collar or necklace and a deep round second collar below), is flanked by two small wheat stalks and included in a beaded inner border; his arm, more or less free, with armlets and bracelet, holds a stick or a tiny extra branch (a fly-whisk?), sometimes with a spear. Among possible symbols above the head are four pellets in a square arrangement, the Eth. letter ወ, W, etc. The obv. is inscribed in Greek all round between the inner and outer circles: + OYCANA(C) BACIΛEYC, i.e. Ousana(s) basiléus, 'Ousana(s) king'; continued likewise on the rev.: + ΘEOY EYXAPICTIA, i.e. Theoû eucharistía, 'by the grace of God' (Types 87 and 89–90 in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 192f. and 194–98; AfrZion 111, nos. 34f., together with Ousas).



Gold coin of Ousana(s) II, diameter ca. 18 mm; drawing courtesy of Wolfgang Hahn



Silver coin of Ousana(s) II, diameter ca. 16 mm; drawing courtesy of Wolfgang Hahn

His only silver issue known displays, on the obv., the king in a (plain) beaded border, head and shoulder profile bust facing rightwards, wearing a head cloth with ribbon behind, without religious symbols. Greek legend: + OYCANAC, i.e. Ousanas. On the rev., in a beaded or ribbed outer border, there is a Greek cross with extremities touching upon it, voided centre inlaid with gold (s. Hahn 2002: 125f., fig. 11), and small intermediate arms between the larger ones. Greek letters divided in four groups by the cross form the second part of the legend: BACIΛEYC, i.e. basiléus, 'king' (Type 88 in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 193f.).

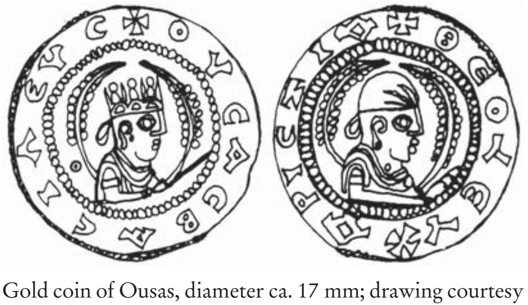
OUSAS

Ou. (Gr. ΟΥϹΑϹ, i.e. Οὐσας, Ousas, et. ʾws [?], s. Conti Rossini 1927: 200), was a Christian king of ↗Aksum in the late 5th/early 6th cent. His name is sometimes taken for an abbreviated form or a different spelling of ↗Ousana(s) II (s. EAE vol. 5), with whom he is supposed to be one and the same. Actually, there were two almost contemporary rulers, with quite similar series of coins, both linked to the slightly later ↗Kaleb's issues – on account of which, Ousa(na)s has been even viewed as another name of Kaleb's father and predecessor ↗Tazena (s. MHAksum 83f., 88 and Munro-Hay in AfrZion 111).



Gold coin of Ousas, diameter ca. 17 mm; drawing courtesy of Wolfgang Hahn Known from his ↗coinage alone, Ou. appears on a series of gold pieces, 26 of them from the hoard of al-Maḍāriba (ca. 70 km west of Aden). On both sides, with beaded outer border and crosses at the top and bottom, the king is portrayed half-length bust facing rightwards, wearing a triple-element tiara or a head cloth resp., with a rounded ribbon falling behind; the bust sometimes descends to the base of the coin. His figure, robed in different ways (a garment in the v-neck style with the front part of the v-shape projecting forwards over a flattened neckband that rises again to meet it just above the hand; with the rounded collar and v-shape above it, and an extra line projecting forwards to represent the left shoulder; with the rounded collar and, perhaps, the shoulder-brooch pellet), is framed by two small wheat stalks and included with them in a beaded inner border; his arm is free, in some instances decorated with armlets and a bracelet, the hand holding a short stick or a triple-strand branch/fly-whisk. Occasional symbols by the left wheat stalks, among them: o, <, and a B on its side. The obv. is inscribed in Greek all round between the inner and outer circles: + ΟΥϹΑϹ Β+ΑϹΙΛΕΥϹ, i.e. Ousas basiléus, ‘Ousas king’; continued likewise on the rev.: + ΘΕΟΥ ΕΥΧΑΡΙϹΤΙΑ, i.e. Theoû eucharistía, ‘by the grace of God’ (Types 84–86 in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 188–92; AfrZion 111, nos. 34–35, together with Ousana[s] II).

Papyrus

P. (Cyperus papyrus; Gəʿəz ሰት/ስት, sätt/sətt, also ሶት, sott; ኀለት/ህለት, ḫəllat/həllat; ደንገል, dängäl, 'stalk of P.'; ጎሜዕ/ጐሜእ, gomeʿ/gʷämeʾ, 'P., reed'; Gr. πάπυρος, pápyros, hence the loanword ፓፒራ, papira) is a wetland sedge once abundantly growing (2–3 m tall) in the Nile Delta of ↗Egypt, where it was used as far back as the 3rd millennium B.C. for boats, mattresses, mats, rope, sandals, baskets and esp. as writing material. The paper made of thin slices cut from the pith of the plant was famously the most used such material in Ancient Egypt well into the Islamic period.

In Ethiopia, P. is only found along the marshy shores of Lake ↗Ṭana. The Greek geographer ↗Strabo has it that P. grows around the edges (perì tà cheílē) of a coastal fresh water lake close to the Pytholaos promontory (Geogr. XVI, 4, 14 [p. 774C]) – to be located on the northern coast of ↗Somalia. According to the 18th-cent. Scottish traveller James ↗Bruce, Egyptian P. would have "early come down from Ethiopia" (BruNile vol. 5, 1f.), as also maintained by modern papyrologists (cp. Bülow-Jacobsen 2009: 5).

Even today the ↗Wäyṭo living on the shores of Lake Ṭana use papyrus reed (dängäl) to make the ↗tankʷa boats. It seems likely that these have an ancient origin, similar boats being already mentioned, perhaps, in the broad "Ethiopian" context of Is. 18:1f.: "Ah, land of whirring wings that is beyond the rivers of Cush [Kûš (↗Kuš) in the Hebrew Bible, Aἰθιοπία(ς), ↗Aithiopía(s) in the LXX Greek text], which sends ambassadors by the sea, in vessels of papyrus [Gr. ἐπιστολὰς βυβλίνας, epistolàs byblínas, mistaken for መጻሕፍት, maṣaḥəft, 'letters', in the Gəʿəz ↗Bible, but restored to ንዋየ ፡ ጎሜዕ, nəwayä gomeʿ, 'vessels of papyrus', in the "new version" quoted in DillmLex 1149] on the waters!".

The use of P. as a writing material, which spread throughout the Mediterranean region, is hitherto unattested in Ethiopia. Yet, interestingly enough, the binding of the Gospels from ↗Ǝnda Abba Gärima (ms. I) bears scant traces of P. (Bausi 2010: 466, 470f.).

Agostino Soldati

Pausewang, Siegfried

P. (b. Wichstadtl, Sudetenland, in today's Czech Republic, 2 February 1937, d. 13 April 2012 Bergen, Norway) was a Norwegian-German social scientist and expert on Ethiopia, who worked and taught most of his life at the Christian Michelsen Institute in Bergen, ↗Norway. P. was a post-World War II refugee and grew up in Hamburg and Wiesbaden, and later studied sociology and politics at the universities of Marburg and Berlin. With his Norwegian wife he moved to Addis Abäba in 1967 to take up a teaching post at ↗Addis Ababa University.

P. was a social researcher and teacher with strong ethical commitments to social justice and ideals of political and economic equality. These aspects he sought to address in his many works on the Horn of Africa, notably Ethiopia. Among his first interests, however, were the methodological problems of studying peasants and the rural sector (cp. Pausewang 1969) and population dynamics (Pausewang 1971). He later went on to become a foremost expert on the peasantry, agrarian problems and land reform policies of contemporary Ethiopia, e.g., the land reform under the Därg (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council) regime (s. Pausewang 1983) and also the policies under the post-1991 government. In the 1990s and 2000s he did further field-based research on rural development and on local perceptions and refractions of politics and "democratization" among rural people. Between 1980 and 1984 he worked as the Head of the German Volunteer Service in Zambia.

After the Ethiopian regime change in May 1991, he developed a stronger interest in political studies, notably when a horizon of democratic promise briefly opened up, but in his opinion also rapidly showed severe limitations. He was an international election observer in Ethiopia and Eritrea in 1992, 1993, 1994, 2000 and 2001 in various ↗United Nations and European Union capacities. In several subsequent works and edited volumes, P. analyzed the deceptions if not failure of democratic politics and electoral processes in the country (and analyzed their consequences; cp. Pausewang et al. 2003). P.'s approach was quite original and was based on a perspective from the bottom up, taking seriously the worldviews, aspirations and feelings of ordinary rural people. His publications on these issues figured prominently in wider social science debates on Ethiopian (rural) society and inspired much empirical research and reflection.

P. was a modest and sincere professional academic rather than a loud activist, but he also engaged in assisting to bring together various political groups in Ethiopia and its ↗diaspora. Probably due to his organizing a conference on the ↗Oromo in 2004 in Norway with the participation of political activists (Pausewang 2009), he was once refused a visa for Ethiopia, although the exact reason was not given. During the 2005-Ethiopian elections P. was a member of the official European Election Observer team, but the Ethiopian government refused to accept him after his arrival as an active member. P. also made himself constantly available to advise and assist asylum seekers from Ethiopia and the Horn in Norway.

Ṗawlos

Abunä Ṗ. (ጳውሎስ, baptismal name Gäbrä Mädḫən; b. 3 November 1933, ʿAdwa, d. 16 August 2012, Addis Abäba) was the fifth Patriarch of the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church (EOTC).

Ṗ. was born to afä mämhər Gäbrä Yoḥannəs Wäldä Śəllase and wäyzäro Aradäčč Tädla. He completed the first stage of church ↗education (↗nəbab bet) at ↗Ǝnda Abba Gärima, and the second and third (↗zema bet and ↗qəne bet) at Ǝnda Abba Ḥadära, under mämhər Wäldä Ḥawaryat, mämhər Gäbrä Ǝgziʾabəḥer, mämhər Kidanä Maryam and mämhər Gäbrä Maryam. He was ordained ↗diyaqon by the metropolitan abunä Marqos and began his service at Ǝnda Abba Gärima. Eventually he took monastic vows and received ↗ordination from the metropolitan abunä Yəsḥaq. Ṗ. completed his modern secondary education at the ↗Holy Trinity Theological College in Addis Abäba. He was sent for further studies to the ↗United States. He attended St. Vladimir’s Orthodox Theological Seminary in New York graduating with a Diploma in Theology in May 1962. He obtained his Bachelor of Divinity from the Berkeley Divinity School at Yale in May 1966 and his Master of Theology in Divinity from Princeton University. His doctoral studies were interrupted in 1974, when he was summoned back to Ethiopia by the Patriarch abunä ↗Tewoflos and was, along with four others, anointed as bishop (↗eṗṗisqoṗṗos) on 12 September 1975, assuming the name abunä Ṗ. He was given the responsibility of the ecumenical affairs by the Patriarch. Prior to his episcopate, Ṗ. had headed different departments of the Patriarchate including St. Paul Higher Theological Seminary, the Department of Publication and Radio, ↗Tənśaʾe Zägubaʾe Printing Press and the Development and Inter Church AID Commission.

In 1976, the ↗Provisional Military Administrative Council (Därg) arrested the Patriarch and the five bishops. Tewoflos was executed in 1979; Ṗ. and his fellow bishops remained imprisoned until 1983. On his release, Ṗ. returned to Princeton to complete his doctoral degree. In 1986, abunä ↗Täklä Haymanot, the third Patriarch of the EOTC, elevated Ṗ. to the rank of Archbishop (liqä ṗaṗṗasat). During his study years, P. established more than ten churches across the United States and served diaspora Ethiopian communities. In 1988 Ṗ. obtained the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Divinity.

After the fall of the Därg in 1991 and the dethronement of the 4th Patriarch abunä Märqorewos, Ṗ. was elected and enthroned on 5 July 1992 as the 5th Patriarch of the EOTC.

Under Ṗ., the Church received back the properties confiscated by the Därg as well as some of the church treasures looted by the ↗Napier expedition to Mäqdäla (including ten ↗tabots held in the ↗British Museum). Ṗ. reformed the central administration of the Patriarchate and had the Patriarchal complex built. Ṗ. was a strong advocate of the victims of the Därg; at the same time he later advocated the release of the top authorities of the communist regime who had been imprisoned for almost two decades. Ṗ. had to agree to the breaking away of the Eritrean Orthodox Church when Eritrea declared independence from Ethiopia. He initiated a series of peace meetings between religious leaders of the two countries in 1998, 1999, and 2000.

Ṗ. was engaged in strengthening ecclesial relations among Oriental Orthodox Churches and travelled extensively for that purpose. He also chaired the Ethiopian Interfaith Dialogue Council. For his support of victims of war, droughts and HIV/AIDS he was awarded the Nansen Medal for Africa by the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees in 2002. In 2006, Ṗ. was elected one of the seven presidents of the World Council of Churches.

Ṗ. died in the Däǧǧazmač Balča Hospital in Addis Abäba. He was buried on 23 August 2012 at the cemetery of the ↗Qəddəst Śəllase Cathedral in Addis Abäba.

Peiresc, Nicolas-Claude Fabri de

P. (b. 1 December 1580, Belgentier, Var, d. 24 June 1637, Aix-en-Provence), a French aristocrat and government official, was a learned man and one of the most outstanding intellectuals and famous men of his times. Considered an "archetype of all antiquarians" or the "Prince of the Republic of Letters", he perfectly embodied the period of transition between the late humanistic age – at its apogee in France – and a new scientific era, entertaining human relationships and correspondence with the most representative scientists, artists and intellectuals of the first half of the 17th cent. (among them, Pierre Gassendi, Galileo Galilei, François de Malherbe, Peter-Paul Rubens, Hugo Grotius, Athanasius Kircher, Claude de Saumaise, Pope Urban VIII, his nephew and librarian Cardinal Francesco Barberini, and many others), and is credited with having written more than 10,000 letters, many of which still remain unpublished and uncatalogued.

P. was educated at the Jesuit colleges in Avignon and Tournon. In 1599, P. moved to Italy, with the intention to study law in Padua. He took advantage of this opportunity to acquire an encyclopaedic culture in natural history, astronomy, and humanities, including Oriental studies. He returned from Italy in 1602 and got his degree in Aix in 1604. He subsequently travelled in the Spanish Netherlands, the United Provinces, and England, finally taking his uncle's position as councillor (senateur) in the parliament of Provence. P. later became secretary to the parliament's president Guillaume du Vair (1556-1621), and followed his master when he took service at Maria de' Medici's court in Paris. In 1623 P. returned to Aix, where in 1624 he took the tonsure of father and was granted an abbacy by Louis XIII at Guitres. He remained in Provence – where the proximity to merchants allowed him to keep an extensive correspondence with the Levant – until his death, devoting himself to the parliament of Provence and to knowledge. P.'s interests ranged from astronomy – where his observations and measurements were remarkable – to anatomy, from palaeontology to general natural sciences, from law and numismatics to epigraphy, history and the arts. All of his intellectual production has remained unpublished.

P. also cultivated a special interest in Oriental languages. With the help of the Capuchin friar father Gilles de Loches – who had also studied Gəᶜəz and written a grammar, which P. wished to publish – P. collected Coptic manuscripts. Some of them, received by Pietro della Valle, were then transmitted to Thomas Obicini for study and publication. After Obicini's death in 1629 the task was resumed by Athanasius Kircher in Rome, whose quite disappointing achievements were very skeptically received by P. (cp. Miller 2004; Hamilton 2006: 210). Evidence of P.'s linguistic interests is the publication by the Accademia degli Umoristi of Rome of a commemorative booklet also containing poetic enchomia in some 40 languages in his honour (Monumentum romanum 95f.), including one in Coptic and one in Ethiopic. The Coptic text (Tristrophum Cophtum) was composed by Kircher (whom P. had recommended to Cardinal Barberini). The Gəᶜəz poem (Carmen Æthiopicum Asfa-Mariæ Æthiopis) was composed by Asfa Maryam, a monk of ↗Santo Stefano dei Mori, which P. also visited; its longer version (preserved in ms. Vat. Lat. Barberini 1996, fols. 101f.) was later published by Chaîne (1933–34).

P.'s most known contribution to Ethiopian studies is the acquisition of ms. Paris BN Éth. 117. P. believed that the manuscript – actually a witness to the Mäṣḥafä ↗məṣṭirä sämay wämədr – was of the then much sought after Mäṣḥafä ↗Henok, as he had been informed in 1633 by Gilles de Loches. The manuscript came in P.'s possession on 4 November 1636, procured in Egypt by father Cassien of Nantes (martyrized in ↗Gondär in 1638 together with father Agathange de Vendôme), as it appears from the epistolary of Peiresc (cp. Id. in Grébaut 1911: 117–25; Apollinaire de Valence 1891: 17f., 270–73). The publication and translation of the purported Mäṣḥafä Henok remained a real obsession for P., as it appears from a letter written a day before his death, where this intention is once more emphasized (cp. Nau in Grébaut 1911: 123). On P.'s death, the manuscript – along with many others of his library – was purchased by Cardinal Jules Mazarin, and finally entered the Royal Library (↗Bibliothèque nationale de France). There, it was later studied by many scholars, such as ↗Wansleben (who made a copy of the manuscript, now BN Éth. 118, and also corrected the original manuscript, cp. Tubiana 1988: 208), ↗Ludolf (cp. LudHist book III, ch. 4, §§ 49 f.; Id. 1691: 347f.), Saumaise, Eugène Renaudot.

Another evidence of P.'s lasting, yet little satisfied, interest towards Ethiopia, was the shipment to a certain "Vermellius", i.e. Gaston Vermeil of Montpellier (purportedly a mercenary soldier at the service of the Ethiopian monarch and commander of the royal army in the years ca. 1622 to the early 1630s) of a number of books on mathematics and military and civil architecture to be used in Ethiopia, in exchange for "Ethiopic books, inscriptions which he could happen to find, and the description of the mountains of Amhara, rites, religion and vessels unknown to the Europeans" (Gassendi 1655: 171).

A second precious Ethiopic manuscript – a 14th-cent. pentaglot ↗Psalter (in Gəʿəz, Syriac, Bohairic, Arabic and Armenian languages) bought for P. by father Agathange de Vendôme in 1635 from the Coptic monastery of Saint Macarius at the price of a liturgical vessel – never entered his library, because the ship which transported it was attacked by the corsairs and looted. After complex passages the manuscript was finally donated to Cardinal Barberini by John Paul Lascaris in 1637, and is now kept in the ↗Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana as Vat. Barberinianus Orient. 2 (cp. Nau 1913: 53–58; GréTisVat I, 859ff.; Volkoff 1970: 38–42; Proverbio 2012).

The name of P. has been adopted for the "Laboratoire Peiresc – Centre de Recherche sur l'Afrique Orientale à Sophia-Antipolis" (France), and for the related publication series "Bibliothèque Peiresc", founded and for several years animated by Joseph ↗Tubiana and other members of the ↗Institut National des Langues et Civilisations Orientales (s. ARESAE).

Pirenne, Jacqueline

P. (b. 1918, Neuilly-sur-Seine, d. 1990, Strasbourg) was a French scholar. A descendant of the historian Henry Pirenne, she studied philosophy at the Sorbonne, from where she obtained her degree in 1939. After World War II she joined the Université Catholique de Louvain and in 1951 obtained a degree in philology and Oriental history. Under the direction of Monseigneur Gonzague Ryckmans, in 1954 she defended her M.A. thesis on Greece and ↗Sabaʾ at the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres (Pirenne 1955). One year later she defended her Ph.D. thesis on Ancient South Arabian (ASA) ↗inscriptions (↗Epigraphic South Arabian) at the Institut Orientaliste of Louvain (Pirenne 1956). Both works were to become highly influential in South Arabian studies.

In 1957, P. joined the French Centre National de la Recherche Scientifique, where she finished her academic career as "directeur de recherche" (research professor) in 1985. In 1987, she managed to establish a seminar of Sabaean studies at the University of Strasbourg. During this time, P. was also involved in archaeology. Between 1960 and 1971, she published nine studies on South Arabian archaeology in the journal Syria and participated in several missions in the Yemen.

P. defended the hypothesis that the Greek alphabet was a possible model of ASA. This idea led to the need to devise a new chronology for ASA history. Running counter to earlier historical theories which dated the beginning of ASA culture to the early-1st millennium, P. suggested that the first attested ASA historical evidences dated to the mid-1st millennium, around the 5th cent. B.C. This chronology was widely accepted up until the 1990s, when the first systematic excavations in the Yemen proved its erroneousness and brought the beginning of ASA history back to the early-1st millennium.

P. spent part of her life in Ethiopia dividing her time between scientific research and helping abandoned children. She took an interest in the chronology of the kings of ↗Aksum and in one of her last works she hypothesized a substantial migration of populations from Ethiopia to South Arabia and not just in the opposite direction (1989).

P. laid the foundations for a palaeographic study of ASA inscriptions which still today is unmatched for its cogency and analytical scope. She established the epigraph as an archaeological object and not merely a text and therefore a component part of art history and not only philology.

Poetry, Amharic

In the Ethiopian traditional culture(s), P. is normally intended for singing (↗Songs) and regarded as a branch of ↗music, and music, in turn, is considered P. This is true for all the many genres of Amharic folk P. with its system of different poetic forms used for the communication within the society. Since the late 19th-early 20th cent., modern written Amharic P. has evolved as a popular genre of ↗Amharic literature.

Folklore P. is composed on a wide variety of occasions. Inseparable from musical culture, poems are always sung or at least (rhythmically) recited (cp. ↗gəṭəm); the recitation can be accompanied by ↗musical instruments such as the ↗bägäna or ↗mäsinqo. Song lyrics cover an extensive range of theme, depending on the occasion for the composition. This can be praise for kings or overlords (of the type of the Old Amharic "Royal songs", s. Guidi 1889; cp. more recent examples in Kamil 1957), songs performed on the occasion of religious ↗feasts and rituals (e.g., ↗əngʷəgʷərro and a few other types of funeral P.), love and ↗wedding songs, work songs, war and boasting chants such as ↗fukkära (also ↗šəlläla and qärärto), laments (like ↗ənqoqəlləš), lullabies etc. Religious, moral and educational P., including parables and tales, also exists. Various types of poetic compositions (humorous, satirical songs) are the domain of the bards such as ↗azmari and ↗lalibäločč. Songs accompanied by bägäna are a kind of elegy for religious meditation. With few exceptions, it was not until the late 19th–20th cent. that some examples of oral Amharic P. were collected, written down and later on put into print (whether by foreign researchers or indigenous scholars and literates such as ↗Ḫəruy Wäldä Səllase who published a collection of lamentations).

Modern written Amharic P. emerged somewhat later than the modern Amharic prose, and was initially dominated and strongly influenced by the abovementioned traditional forms as well as Gəᶜəz poetry (↗qəne). It seems that the pioneers of the modern Amharic literature did not express much interest in writing poetic texts, and if they did, they used poetic forms on very special occasions. Sometimes these works were printed, but apparently not for the broad public: cp. an epic poem on the 1916 battle of ↗Sägäle by aqqa Gäbru, praising the victorious alga wäraš Täfäri Mäkʷännən (s. Fusella in PICES 6, 133–92); a 1916 polemic poem by ↗Afäwärq Gäbrä Iyäsus (Fusella, in PICES 5a, 1–34); praise songs in MahZekr 872–86.

The earliest published collection of modern Amharic poetry is thought to be Yäbägäna mäzmur (lit. 'Bägäna Psalms') by däbtära Admasu Ǧämbäre of ↗Dima Giyorgis. However, according to the author, he wrote the collection in 1921/22 to create an Amharic "equivalent" for the Gəᶜəz Psalter, to be performed as songs with bägäna. Its first edition (1929/30) contains a collection of 100 "psalms" (the second, printed in 1947/48, includes 50 more). All "psalms" feature the same metric structure of 12 syllables and three caesurae in a verse. In an original and individual way, the author draws on common themes of the Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church teaching (Bərhanu Gäbäyyähu 2008/09:170f.).

Other pre-war intellectuals who published their poems are ↗Wäldä Giyorgis Wäldä Yoḥannəs (1934/35), ↗Yoftahe Nəguśe (1935/36) and ↗Agäññähu Ǝngəda (1935/36) (s. Bərhanu Gäbäyyähu 2008/09:170 and no. 29).

Amharic P. made a stronger appearance only after the 1941 Liberation, primarily in the form of moralistic and pious poems (conforming to the trend in the Amharic prose), and also in some other traditional forms (e.g., "praising poems"). One of the earliest works printed seems to be Mäzmurä lədät by ↗Yared Gäbrä Mikaʾel (1938 A.M. [1946 A.D.]). Other authors who published poetic works (in some cases, extensive poetic passages included in prosaic works) in 1950s were, e.g., Mäzgäbu Abatä, Agdaw Wäldä Giyorgis, Dässaläññ Agaze, Asras Asfa Wäsän, Wänd Yərad Yəmar, Nəguśe Täfärra, Mäkbəb Gäbäyyähu, and a few others. ↗ᶜAlämayyähu Mogäs printed an impressive patriotic "geographic" poem Mälkəᶜa Ityop̣ya (in 1960, anticipating the complete dissolving ↗Ethiopian-Eritrean federation since ↗Eritrea is listed as one of the provinces). The most prominent was, however, ↗Käbbädä Mikaʾel, with his 1947 didactic and educative poem Bərhanä ḫəllina. He extensively uses poetic speech also in his dramatic works, such as Annibal (1964); Ato Bälaynäh wäyəm yäqəṭat maᶜəbäl (1965/66), Yätənbit qäṭäro (1971/72); and in the didactic novel Yäᶜəwqät bəlləč̣ta (1963/64). Especially in the case of Käbbädä Mikaʾel, poetic speech was apparently considered as powerful device facilitating "teaching process", and explaining values or conveying information better than the prose.

Some of the early Amharic poets, in the first line such influential figures as ↗Märsəᶜe Ḫazän Wäldä Qirqos, ↗Maḫtämä Śəllase Wäldä Mäsqäl, ᶜAlämayyähu Mogäs, and also Käbbädä Mikaʾel, paid great attention to systematizing P. through defining poetic forms (frequently tracing them back to the traditional songs, or adjusting them to qəne-poetry). E.g., Märsəᶜe Ḫazän Wäldä Qirqos (1942/43:212ff.) identified eight patterns of the Amharic verse (cp. 19 patterns in KaneLit 24ff.). The metric patterns range from lines of three to 12 syllables, commonly divided into two hemistitches (cp. ibid., and Bərhanu Gäbäyyähu 2006/07:238–52). Often used patterns were identified as ወዳጅ ፡ ዘመዴ (wädağ zämäde), a line with seven syllables; መዲና (mädina), a line with eight syllables; ደምበኛ ፡ ቤት (dämbäñña bet), a line with 12 syllables.

There was a tendency to equate Amharic P. with P. in Gəᶜəz, especially qəne (starting from the name, "Amharic qəne"). Some authors "experimented" with mixing metric patterns (early ↗Yoḥannes Admasu, early ↗Abbe Gubäñña) and even languages (Yoftahe Nəguśe). Also, Amharic P. was expected to be written in accordance with qəne-forms such as ↗mäwäddəs (a poem having nine to ten lines) and ↗gubaʾe qana (a simple poem having only two lines). Early poets strove to adopt for Amharic verses the technique known as ↗sämənna wärq or other devices of the traditional Gəᶜəz P. Any (good) qəne was expected to contain in its core a poetic figure, i.e. two semantic layers: the obvious meaning of the words called "wax", and their more or less hidden meaning, the "gold". In a poem, "wax and gold" are presented in opposition, while their predicates are rendered jointly by a single verb which carries both the wax and the gold meaning. Such art of verses requires a masterly knowledge of the language and a skilful employment of such means as ambiguity, shift of word boundaries, assimilation, gemination or replacement of radicals, exchange of voiced, voiceless or glottalized phonemes, insertion or elision of -ə-, use of words in an abstract sense or insertion of idiomatic expressions (Richter 2002: 573ff.). The following Amharic qəne (taken from Maḫtämä Śəllase Wäldä Mäsqäl 1962/63: 25) may illustrate this:

> አዳራሹ ፡ ሰፊ ፡ በሩ ፡ አልጠበባችሁ ፡
> በተራ ፡ በተራ ፡ ምነው ፡ መግባታችሁ?
> Addarašu säffi bärru alṭäbbäbaččəhu
> Bätära bätära mənnäw mägbataččəhu?

The "wax"-meaning is:

> The hall is wide, the door is not narrow for you.
> Why are you entering one after the other?

The change of the word boundary from bätära bätära ('one after the other') to bätärabä tära ('instead of the hungry') leads to the "golden" meaning (or məśtir, 'mystery', i.e. the hidden meaning):

> The hall is wide, the door is not narrow for you.
> Why are you entering (first), instead of the hungry?

About a dozen of figures, also in fact included into the repertoire of sämənna wärq technique, were considered to be useful for the symbolic and subtle art of qəne-P. in Amharic (e.g., Märsəᶜe Ḫazän Wäldä Qirqos 1942/43: 215–20). However, being continuation of the traditional poetic practices much revered in Ethiopia, such type of P. was not adopted for the nascent modern readership. Later, this type of P. has retained some popularity until the recent time, intended not only for the public with traditionalistic attitudes, but increasingly becoming a vehicle of teaching the Amharic language (cp., e.g., such books as Nəguśe Nägäwo Dägaga 1999/2000).

Completely different, modern trends in Amharic P. became visible only in the late 1950s. ↗Mängəśtu Lämma, one of Ethiopia's biggest 20th-cent. authors, could be considered the first truly modern author of Amharic P. In the preface to his poetic collection Yägəṭəm gubaᵓe (1957/58) he expressed hopes that his poetry would be "pleasant reading" for "young people of our time, both men and women"; and doubted, on the other hand, that he would find much understanding among elderly readers, who might find his love poems "shameful" (ayn afarənnät yalläw nägär) because they were not familiar with the poetry of Shakespeare or ↗Pushkin. In his verses Mängəśtu Lämma turned to the internal world of his characters and introduced the lyricism of an unprecedented openness, sharing with the readers his emotional experiences and personal feelings (in narrative poems and love poems). Some poems, such as "Bäṭärra č̣äräqa …" ('Under the new moon …'), "Təzzəta" ('Memory') brought Mängəśtu Lämma the world fame. He also acted as an early literary critic, trying to foresee the future ways of the Amharic modern P. He represented the opinion that, for writing poems, a poet had to learn how to do it but also must have a special talent for that. He recommended a simplification of the system of the Amharic metrics, proposing to drop the forms which were derived from the songs and to keep three basic forms for the verses. Also he understood the ambiguity of the sixth order grapheme that permits the elision or insertion of -ə-, decisive for establishing the number of syllables within a line (Mängəstu Lämma 1963).

↗Ṣäggaye Gäbrä Mädḫən became widely known as a poet thanks to his collection Əsat wäy abäba ('Flower or Fire', 1966/73–74) which was pioneering, among other things, because of emotional monologues ("Yədräs lä-wändəmme lämmalawqəh", 'Might it Reach my Brother whom I do not Know'; "Ay Märkato!", 'Oh Märkato!'), his new vision of nature ("Abrän zəmm ənnəbäl", 'Let us Keep Silence Together'; "Awaš"), even in his view of history ("Dogᶜali", "Ambo", "ᶜAdwa"; cp. also Bərhanu Gäbäyyähu 2008/09: 181). His rich imaginary, extensive application of ellipsis and hyperbole, poetic discourse sometimes amounting to the "stream of consciousness" require from the reader intensive mental process and emotional co-involvement. He also enriched Amharic metrics with the so-called "Ṣäggaye bet", of 16 syllables per line.

Poets who experimented with poetic forms and tried to go beyond the then poetic canons in search of creative freedom and new means of expression were Sälomon Däressa (Ləǧənnät, 'Childhood', 1970) and Säyfu Mättafäriya. The latter, however, strove to link the modern poetry with qəne-tradition; the former applied the "blank verse" (called wälälo), getting a good portion of criticism. Ṣäggaye Gäbrä Mädḫən and Sälomon Däressa's were the first poets to include in their verses elements from their ↗Oromo cultural background.

↗Gäbrä Krəstos Dästa, a famous painter, wrote poems experimenting with graphic representation of texts and punctuation signs (but they became widely known only in recent time, s. Heran Sereke-Berhan 2006).

↗Addis Ababa University was the place that in 1950–60 produced a number of poets who strongly articulated their social and cultural positions, as well as their attitude to the country's current situation. Such writers as Yoḥannəs Admassu, Ḫaylu Gäbrä Yoḥannəs, Daññaččäw Wärqu, Säyfu Mättafäriya (Afär yanäśśa śəga, 'Flesh that Raised the Dust' 1964 A.M. [1972 A. D.], Yätäsfa əgər bərät, 'Fetters of the Hope Feet' 1969 A.M. [1976 A.D.]), Gərma Taddäsä and Mäsfən Wäldä Maryam saw poetry as one of the means for changing the society (Bərhanu Gäbäyyähu 2008/09: 187, 190).

Despite the rise in the 1960s, the conditions for the development of the modern Amharic P., in particular for that one not oriented towards the traditional forms, were still not favourable. The reasons were the same that affected the development of the modern Amharic literature in general: the lack of a large interested readership, appreciation of poetic work only from the side of a small part of the educated society, absence of literary criticism and opportunities for poets to develop their skills. The conditions deteriorated in the post-1974 ↗Revolution period; yet, despite all odds, that time saw the rise of at least three renowned poets, such as ↗Däbbäbä Säyfu (with collection Yäbərhan fəqre, 'My Love of Light', 1987/88), Ayyalnäh Mulatu (collections Ṭəggät lam, 'Milk Cow', 1992/93), and Fäqadä Azzäzä.

After the fall of the Därg, the improvement of the social and political situation in the country resulted in a surge in writing and publishing of P. Some collections of Amharic P. which had been written in 1950s-70s and considered "classics" of Amharic literature 20 years later, were (re)printed. A new trend in the literary life was the emergence of a number of new associations (in addition to a few well-established like Yä-Ityopya därasəyan maḫəbär, 'Association of the Ethiopian writers', set up in 1960) and "clubs" of authors, and also poets, offering for them at least a sort of support, a forum, and a hope to develop their talent. Young poets have been entering literary life in growing numbers. Many of them appear on the literary scene for a short time only; others have been able to attract attention, like Getənnät Ǝnnəyäw (Ǝwqätən fəlläga, 'Looking for Knowledge', 1985); Tagäl Säyfu (Qäfowən attənkut, 'Do not Touch the Beehive', 1986); Bälay Mäkonnən (Yäqəne käwakəbt, 'Qəne Stars', 1990); Bäfäqadu Moräda (Yätəwləde mäzmur, 'The Psalm of My Generation', 1994); Wasihun Bälay (Algäbam goǧǧoye, 'I Will not Enter My Hut', 1998), and many more. A new feature of the literary life is the appearance of female poets (some claiming to have started writing poems many years before their first publications), like Mulu Sälomon (Gize, 'Time', 2001; Sənkəfre, 2004); Wəddalat Gädamu (Ǝnnatənna ləǧǧ, 'Mother and Child', 2004; Sədätäñña gəṭəmočč, 'Refugee Poems', 2010); ʿAlämitu Dämäna (Battəggarraññ, 'You Shall not Share with Me', 2003); Firmaye ʿAlämu (the head of the Ethiopian Women Writer Association, until her death in 2001) and Aräggaš Säyfu (participated in the collection of 170 poems, Ǝñña, 'We', 1998, together with Mäqdäs Gämbäru, Märkäb Ṣäggaye, Śännayt Abärra, Səmaññ Gəzaw). Young female poets' voice is represented, among others, by the Association of the Ethiopian Young Women. Bigger urban centres, Addis Abäba in the first line, play the leading role in spreading the P. culture. In addition, Amharic P. has been flourishing in Ethiopian ↗diaspora, particularly in the USA.

The complexity of the Ethiopian modern literary life, its increasing openness to the outside influences, growing role of the mass media and quick spread of education, interaction with the powerful layer of the traditional culture and different ethnic cultures, make contemporary Amharic P. a manifold social phenomenon, still waiting for evaluation and study.

Polo, Marco

P. (b. ca. 1254, Venice, [?], d. 1324, Venice) was a Venetian merchant and traveller. His recollections, duly recorded, greatly contributed to Europe’s knowledge and perception of the Orient.

Born to an old family of traders, P. was the son of Niccolò and the nephew of Marco and Maffio (i.e. Matteo), his father’s elder and younger brother, resp. Under the supervision of Marco, Niccolò and Maffio had established their firm in Constantinople (↗Byzantine Empire) before 1259/60. They moved their business to Soldaja (today’s Sudak), on the north rim of the Black Sea (Crimea), and then further into the western parts of the newly-formed Mongol empire known in Europe as the Golden Horde. At Buḫārā, in modern Uzbekistan, where they stayed for three years, they joined the embassy of Īlḫān Hūlāgū of Persia (↗Iran) – who had earlier invited them to travel east – to his brother Great Ḫān Qūbīlāy, the founder of the Yuan dynasty. Having ventured as far as “Cathay”, i.e. Northern China, and present day Beijing, Qūbīlāy’s seat, the Polos returned temporarily to Europe in 1266 with a message from Qūbīlāy to the pope. In that letter the former requested oil from the lamp of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre (↗Jerusalem) and a hundred wise men acquainted with the liberal arts to teach Christianity and Western customs to his people, so as to oppose the diffused Lamaistic practice of magic.

However, Pope Clement IV, who in 1267–68 had engaged in correspondence with Īlḫān Abaqa, had died in 1268, while the new pope, Gregory X, was elected only in 1271. Delayed in their attempts to satisfy Qūbīlāy’s request, in 1269/70, and after staying for a while at St. John of Acre (Galilee), where they sought advice from the pontifical legate Theobald Visconti (the future Pope Gregory X), the two brothers headed back to Venice. Here, Niccolò found his son, by then 15 or 16 years old, who had been living with other relatives since the death of his mother, and was educated in such subjects as foreign currency, appraising and cargo shipping.

In 1271, taking P. with them, the Polos left again for the Orient, accompanied by two Dominican friars, Niccolò of Vicenza and Guillaume of Tripolis, who quitted, though, before reaching their destination. They were carrying presents and letters from Gregory X, whose idea of crusade implied an alliance with the Mongols (purportedly Christian). The Polos reached Qūbīlāy at Kaipingfu or Shangdu, his summer capital, in 1274 – after a three-year journey through the Middle East and Central Asia.

P. was quick to learn the languages and customs of the Mongols as well as of the Persians, but not of the Chinese; this was usual for officials of foreign origin in newly-conquered China. He thus earned the full confidence of Qūbīlāy, who sent him on several missions throughout the Yuan Empire, especially to the inaccessible regions between Tibet and Yunnan. It is possible that P. became governor of Yangzhou or, more likely, superintendent of the salt-works. While carrying out his duties, he was able to make keen observations of the lands in which he travelled and give accurate reports to the emperor. In 1291, after 17 years, Qūbīlāy, who had always declined the Polos' requests to return to Europe, gave them a last assignment: to escort the Mongol princess Kökečin to her betrothed, Īlḫān Arġūn, the son of Abaqa. Departing from the southern port of Zitong (later Quanzhou), via Sumatra, Ceylon (Sri Lanka) and ↗India (where, among other places, P. visited Mylapore, with the tomb of St. Thomas), the party eventually crossed the "Arabian Sea" (Indian Ocean) to Hurmūz and reached Persia in 1293 or 1294. The two-year voyage, partly along the ancient silk roads, was a perilous one: of the 600 people in the convoy (apart from those who organized it) only 18 survived, among them the Polos. Arġūn having died in 1291, they left the princess with the new īlḫān, Gayḫātu, and moved overland to Trebizond (now Trabzon, Turkey), sailing from there to Venice, which they found at war with Genoa.

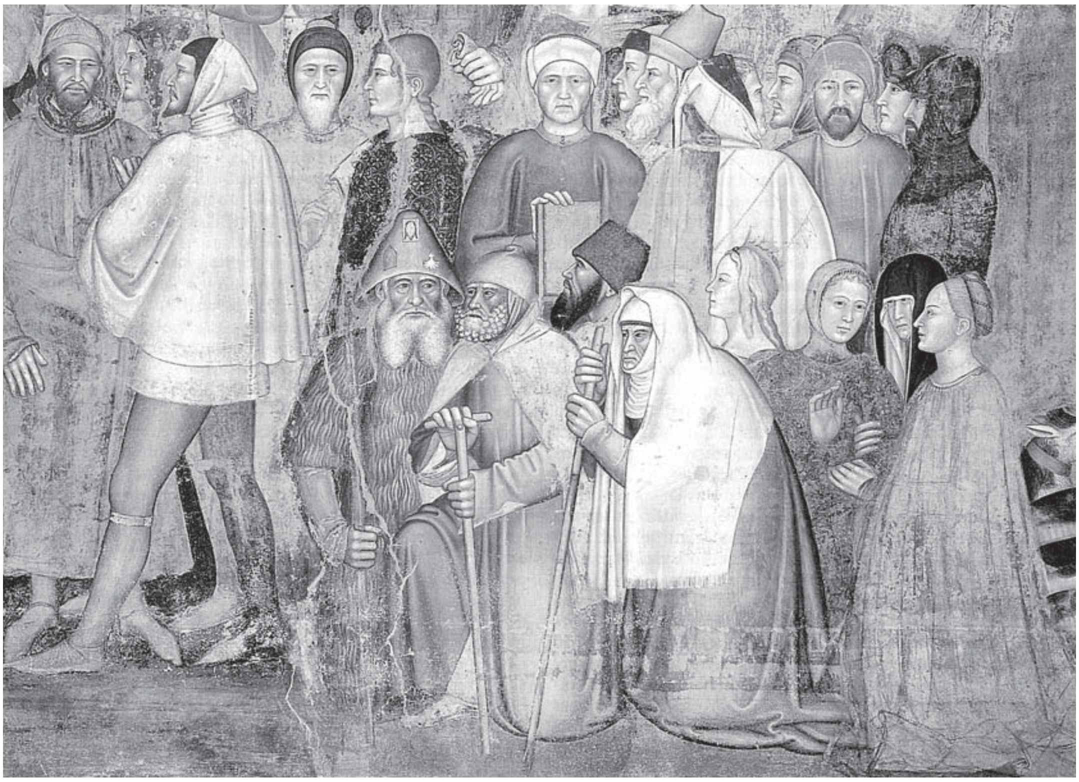
During this war, P. was taken prisoner by the Genoese in unclear circumstances: according to tradition, either after the Venetian defeat near Curzola (the Dalmatian island of Korčula) in 1298 or during a sea battle or, more plausibly, following an act of piracy off Lajazzo (Āyās, not far from Adana, modern Turkey) in 1296. While detained in Genoa, he had the opportunity of dictating his memoirs, in the form of a detailed travelogue, to a fellow inmate, Rustichello da Pisa, a romance writer who incorporated tales of his own and turned the text into a book in the Langue d'oïl (the ancestor of French), a lingua franca of chivalric and crusader stories: Le divisament dou monde, better known as The Travels of Marco Polo or Book of the Marvels of the World, commonly called Milione, possibly from the Polos' use of the (nick)name Emilione to distinguish their branch of the family.

Released in August 1299, P. returned to Venice – where his father and uncle had purchased a large house – and became a wealthy merchant. He married Donata Badoer, the daughter of a wealthy fellow trader, and had three children. In his will, written on 9 January 1324 (Venice, Biblioteca Nazionale Marciana, cod. Lat. V 58 = 2437, c. 33, s. Zorzi 1988), P. set free a "Tatar slave" who may have followed him from Asia. P. died shortly after and was buried in the church of San Lorenzo in Castello before 24 June of the same year. There his tomb remained until 1797.

Created mainly as a handbook for merchants, essentially focusing on products, weights, measures and distances, and yet burdened with exaggerations and legends well beyond the author's experience during his long stays in China and India, the Milione depicts P.'s journeys, along with further stories and details directly or indirectly linked with them. It is divided into four parts. Book I describes the lands of the Middle East and Central Asia, with the domains of "Prestre Johan" (↗Prester John), for P. either a king of the Kereits (Qara Ḫitāy) in central Mongolia or a prince of the Ongut, a Nestorian tribe living in the northern part of the Ordos (inner Mongolia) and territories to the north-east of it (LXV.16–LXVIII.12 [26d–27d] ed. 1928 = 64, 6–67, 6 ed. 1975 and, resp., LXXIII.9–LXXIV. 21 [31b–31c] = 72, 6–73, 11 and CIX.7–CX. 19 [48c–49a] = 107, 3–108, 14). Book II is devoted to China and the court of Qūbīlāy. Book III describes such coastal regions of the East as Japan, India, Ceylon, Southeast Asia and the east coast of Africa. Book IV covers the then recent wars among the Mongols and describes some regions of the Far North, among them Russia.

Thus the Milione brings together both first-hand knowledge and hearsay evidence, i.e. anecdotes and current affairs of places P. could not have visited personally – for which, however, his pages prove to be mostly objective and reliable. This is the case, e.g., for the famous stories of the "Assassins", an Ismaʿīlī sect centred at Ālamūt, near Qazwīn (XLI–XLIII [18b–19b] = 40–42), not far from P.'s itinerary, but also for those on the more remote countries of the Red Sea and the Horn of Africa, with "Middle India, which is called Abasce, i.e. [al-]Ḥabaša or '↗Abyssinia' (CXCIII.60–CXCIV.105 [93a–94c] = 187, 24–189, 18) – vs. the Greater and Lesser Indias, stretching from Coromandel to Makran and, resp., from today's Vietnam to Andhra Pradesh (s. ↗"India" as a name of Ethiopia).

On that peculiarly "western" milieu, comprising such islands as the fabulous, and Christian, "Male" and "Female", with a suffragan bishopric of "Scara" or "Scotra" (↗Soqotra), a ↗Nestorian archbishopric ultimately dependent on the see of Baġdād (CXC–CXCI [90b–91b] = 184f.), he relates data and lore then circulating, in Arabic garb,



Niccolò, Maffio and Marco Polo celebrated as ambassadors, missionaries and merchants, standing in the upper row, next to the lady in profile and the gentleman with a hood. They are depicted in Oriental ("Tatar") attire, Marco holding his book (cp. Olschki 1957: 113ff.); fresco from 1366, detail of the Militant Church by Andrea di Bonaiuto and followers on the southern wall of the Cappellone degli Spagnoli in Florence, church of Santa Maria Novella; photo courtesy of the DSAMS, Università degli Studi di Milano through the harbours of the Indian Ocean. In this connection, clues seem to plead for ^{c}Adan (today's Yemen), of which he offers a most valuable description as a trading centre and a "province" (CXCV [94d–95a] = 190 in particular, s. Conti Rossini 1940: 1021f.; Tedeschi 1981: 362f.). Likewise, the island of "Ma(n)dagascar", actually ↗Mogadishu in the Somali peninsula of Banādir, appears to be ruled by "IV esceque – ce vaut a dire IV vielz hommes" ("four shaiks, that is to say four elders"), i.e. the Arba^{c} Rukun, "Four Wise Men" (rukun being here a plur. of rakīn?), well known from Arabic sources on the origins of the local sultanate in the 13th cent. (CXCII [91b–92b] = 186, s. Fiaccadori 1989: 257ff. and ns. 3–6).

P.'s "Abasce" is a powerful Christian kingdom whose people are branded by fire as a mark of their religious identity. It is governed by three Christian and three Muslim rulers, all paying obedience to a greater Christian king, the "roi d'Abasce". The latter was then "at war with the sultan of Aden and with that of ↗Nubia", the latter being distinguished from Ethiopia but possibly confused with a Muslim realm (CXCIV.14–18 [93a] = 188, 7, s. Tedeschi 1981: 367f., 373). In 1288, the greater king – nəguś ↗Yagba Ṣəyon – was the protagonist of a "bielle estoire": he wanted to go on pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, but was persuaded to send a bishop instead; the latter was captured and circumcised on his return way by the sulṭān of "Aden" (CXCIV.19–85 [93b–94b] = 189, 1–13, s. Tedeschi 1981: 367f., 373). This was a (Beğa) chief neither of ^{c}Adan nor of ↗^{c}Adal, but of the coast region – between the ↗Barka delta and the border of ↗Eritrea – mentioned as "Adam" or "Ad(d)an" in the early 15th-cent. itineraries of Antonio ↗Bartoli and Pietro ↗Rombulo (s. Tedeschi 1981: 377ff., 383–86; cp. Fiaccadori 2005: 46 and n. 13).

P.'s work afforded Europeans their first comprehensive insight into the East, from the more familiar African shores of the Red Sea up to the almost unknown land of Japan that Qūbīlāy was attempting to seize. It is worth noting that other famous 13th-cent. European travellers to the Orient such as the Franciscans André de Longjumeau, William of Rubruck and Giovanni di Pian del Carpine did not reach as far as China. Besides, they were missionaries, with a strictly religious perspective. P. obviously had a Christian audience and some prejudice against Islam, as well as (Tibetan) Buddhism and its magic bias, but his point of view is generally more open, as reflected in a number of acute remarks on political circumstances and military events, as well as geographic, ethnic and economic situations. P. paid great attention to the customs and culture of the people he encountered or heard of on his way to and from China – which accounts for the unique fascination of the Milione.

A rare popular success in an era before printing, the Milione soon spread throughout Europe, enjoying wide diffusion in terms of the numbers of copies and translations into European languages, within P.'s lifetime. About 150 manuscripts in the different versions are extant, with major textual discrepancies. Quite a few of these manuscripts are illuminated: luxury exemplars were produced for Charles of Valois (from a copy presented to him, through his seneschal Thibaut de Chepoy, by P. in 1307) and for John Duke of Berry a century later (s. Chiappori 1998: 608 and Gousset 2002: 6f.; in general, Il Milione ed. [1999]: XIX–XXIV). During the copying and translating process, however, the original text disappeared, overshadowed by new versions, first and foremost the Latin one, De mirabilibus mundi ('The Marvels of the World'), completed in 1314 by the Dominican Francesco Pipino and still transmitted in some 50 manuscripts. P.'s work was first printed in German (Nuremburg 1477), then in Latin (Gouda 1483/84 ca.) and Portuguese (Lisbon 1502), hence its impact on the "age of discovery".

An effort to collate manuscripts and improve on P.'s available text was made by Giovambattista Ramusio as early as 1559: for the third volume of his Italian collection of travellers he used an authoritative Latin manuscript (Toledo, Biblioteca capitular, ms. Zelada 49.20, "Z", once the property of Cardinal Francesco Saverio de Zelada), that preserves details likely to have been censored in the rest of the tradition (ed. 1980). A critical edition of the original was only achieved, however, by Luigi Foscolo Benedetto in 1928, based on the oldest surviving testimony, ms. Paris BN, fr. 1116 ("F", in French heavily flavoured with Italian), which he amended on the basis of the more detailed texts of Ramusio as well as of another Latin manuscript (Milan, Biblioteca Ambrosiana, Y. 160 sup.). Benedetto's edition prompted further translations, starting from his own into Italian (1932), which features the critically reconstructed text in a continuous narrative, and Aldo Ricci's, with an Orientalist introduction and an index by Edward Denison Ross (1931).

P.'s pioneering journey – the first such endeavour to be widely known – exerted a definitive influence on the development of European ↗cartography, and ultimately led to European voyages and explorations more than a century later. 30 names in China and a number of other Asian toponyms are to be found in the 1375 Catalan Atlas, used in turn by ↗Fra Mauro for his famous mid-15th-cent. Mappamondo. Although never mentioned here, P.'s work ranks among the primary sources of Fra Mauro's masterpiece – a "visual rendering" of the Milione. According to a local tradition preserved by Ramusio (1980: 68f.), entire parts of the Mappamondo were drawn "from a most beautiful and very old nautical map and a world map that had been brought from Cathay by the magnificent Messer Marco Polo and his father" (cp. Fiaccadori 2012: 327f.). Inspired by P.'s description of the Far East and its wonders (including cannibals and spice growers), Christopher Columbus tried to reach those lands by sea, on a westward route. He owned a printed copy of the De mirabilibus mundi that can still be seen, with his notes, in the Columbian Library in Seville.

Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Pontius Pilate

P. (Lat. Pontius Pilatus, Gr. Πόντιος Πιλᾶτος, Póntios Pilâtos, Eth. ጲላጦስ ፡ ጴንጠናዊ, Ṗilaṭos Ṗänṭänawi, d. 37/38 A.D.?), a Roman knight (eques) of likely Samnite origin, was the fifth praefectus ('governor') of Judaea, with an unusually long period of office, ca. 26 to 36 A.D., under Emperor Tiberius I. Actually a protégé of the latter's favourite Seianus (who, however, fell from the emperor's grace in 30 A.D.), besides control of financial administration, P. also exerted supreme judicial power. In this capacity, he presided over the trial of Jesus, releasing him to the Jews to be crucified.

The chief sources both for this event, to which P.'s fame is definitely bound, and for his biography are the canonical ↗ Gospels (Mt 27, 1–31; Mc 15, 1–20; Lc 23, 1–5; Jo 18, 28–19, 16 and 21) and the Roman historian Tacitus (Ann. XV, 44). The Jewish writers Philo of Alexandria (Leg. ad Caium 38, with a letter of Herod Agrippa I to Caligula) and Flavius Josephus (Ant. Iud. XVIII, 3, 2) dwell on P.'s merciless and obstinate temper and, resp., on other incidents that took place during his tenure, owing to his insensitivity to Jewish customs. After being reported to Vitellius, legate of Syria, for attacking the Samaritans on Mt. Gerizim in 36 A.D., P. was charged for cruelty and oppression and summoned to trial in Rome, but Tiberius had died (37 A.D.) before P. could reach there. Equally important is the "Pilate stone", a Latin inscription discovered in 1961 at the Roman theatre of Caesarea Maritima, the capital of Judaea, and presently housed in the Israel Museum of Jerusalem (Année épigraphique 1963, no. 104; cp. Holum – Hohlfelder 1988: 108ff. and fig. 67). The authenticity of this inscription can hardly be doubted: it yields P.'s official title, [praef]ectus (against Tacitus's procurator, indeed the same office in "archaic" garb), and lends historicity to his character as featured in the Gospels.

With varying emphasis and details, the Gospels underscore P.'s reluctance to send Jesus to death, as he found no guilt with him – up to washing his hands to show that he was not responsible for the execution. John in particular provides a more dramatic insight into the dialogue between Jesus and P., whose main question to him was whether he truly considered himself to be the "King of the Jews" (Jn 18:37). Jesus's confirming his kingship was not enough, however, for P. to view him as a potential political threat (Jn 18:38). According to Matthew (27:19), even P.'s wife (St. Proc[u]la or Claudia in later Christian traditions), following a dream or premonition, spoke to him in favour of Jesus. It was customary for Roman governors to set a prisoner free at Passover. After the crowd asked for the release of Barabbas (a notorious murderer), P. eventually felt compelled to sentence Jesus to death against his own will. He then ordered a sign, reading "Jesus the Nazarene, the King of the Jews" (the so-called titulus Crucis), to be posted "in Hebrew, Greek and Latin" above the crucified, to give public notice of the legal charge against him (Jn 19:19–22).

With reference to an otherwise unknown report by P. on the crucifixion, ↗Eusebius of Caesarea maintains that P. suffered great misfortunes under Emperor Caligula (37–41 A.D.), was exiled to Gaul and eventually, on the orders of Caligula, killed himself at Vienne (Hist. eccl. II, 7; Chron. ad a. 39 A.D.) – according to the 10th-cent. Melkite bishop Agapius of Manbiğ, in 37/38 A.D. (Kitāb al-ᶜUnwān, 'Book of the Title', ed. Vasiliev 1911: 483 [= 27]). Quite later traditions variously locate the place of P.'s death in Italy or Switzerland, but none of them – including the legends in Germanic folklore – can be considered authoritative.

The agenda surfacing in the canonical Gospels, which places the blame on the Jews, not on the Romans, is apparent in a series of further Greek writings concerning P., among them the 4th/5th-cent. apocryphal Acta Pilati ('Acts of Pilate'), later found as the first part (chs. 1–16, followed by the Descensus ad inferos, 'Harrowing of Hell') of the medieval Latin Evangelium Nicodemi ('Gospel of Nicodemus', to whom an alleged Hebrew original is attributed). The more or less contemporary Anaphora Pilati ('Report of Pilate') contains P.'s purported letter to Tiberius on Jesus's trial and its aftermath (this text should not be confused with that mentioned by Eusebius). Its continuation, the Paradosis Pilati ('Handing over of Pilate'), is a fictitious account on P. being recalled to Rome and censured by the emperor.

These apocryphal writings quickly spread, with various fortunes, into Latin and the languages of the Christian Orient (Syriac, Coptic, Arabic, Ethiopic, Armenian and Georgian). There they gave birth to several cycles of legends, as attested to by the interlinked minor literature on P., such as the 10th/11th-cent. Arabic apocryphal Gospel of John (i.e. the ↗Täʾammərä Iyäsus of ↗Gəᶜəz literary tradition). Some of the above Greek writings convey both a mild judgement upon P.'s crime – as a matter of fact, instrumental in the atonement – and the claim that, like his wife, he actually became a Christian. As such, he appears already in Tertullian (2nd cent. A.D.), also hinting at a report sent by P. to Tiberius and claiming the emperor himself was a Christian (Apol. 5, 2 and 21, 24, cp. Justin, Apol. I, 35, 9 and 48, 3). The legends concerning P. are intermingled, in more than one respect, with the cycle of Tiberius – eager to punish him and the Jews for the crucifixion – and thereby connected to the legend of ↗Abgar and the "true portrait" of Jesus.

In further elaborations of the original cycle (the so-called Acta Salvatoris, 'Acts of the Saviour') and its eastern offshoots, P. became a holy man and a martyr for the Coptic and the Ethiopian Churches, in which he is considered a saint and commemorated, with his wife, on 25 Baʾūna and 25 Säne, resp. He has a proper entry only in the Ethiopic ↗Sənkəssar (GuiSyn I 674f.; the memory of Procula, but not of P., is celebrated on 27 October by the Greek Orthodox Church). Here, as in the corresponding entry of the Coptic Synaxarium, he is also held responsible for the death of Longinus, the soldier who pierced Jesus's side on the Cross with his spear (cp. Cerulli 1973: 147 and n. 1). Evidence for the cult of P. in Egypt are both the existence, in the late 12th cent., of a church dedicated to him at Abyar (Ibyār), a village in the Delta, and the diffusion of his name among the Copts from the 6th to the 18th cent. (Luisier 1996: 411–20). A Psali ('Psalmody') from a 19th-cent. manuscript of Ḥarat Zawīla (Cairo), the seat of an Ethiopian community too (CerPal II, 354–60), seems to have been translated from Ethiopic in the 16th/17th cent. (Volkoff 1969–79: 170 n. 1).

The main work in this connection is the Martyrdom of Pilate, presenting P.'s spiritual accomplishments, crowned by his martyrdom in Rome. A medieval Egyptian composition with Jerosolimitan features, this work was originally written in Arabic – and transmitted also in ġaršūnī within the Syrian Orthodox milieus of Palestine (ed. Mingana 1928: 531–80 [283–332]) – as a homily under the authorship of Cyriacus of Behnesa, whose name conceals that of (Judas) ↗Cyriacus of Jerusalem, the legendary bishop martyred under Julian the Apostate (Luisier 1996: 411f. and n. 8). In the text itself, Gamaliel – i.e. Rabban Gamaliel the Elder, a member of the Sanhedrin and a contemporary of Jesus (Acts 5:34 and 22:3) – is introduced as a witness to the events (ed. Monferrer Sala 2009). The Ethiopic version, Səmᶜa Ṗilaṭos (‘Martyrdom of Pilate’), was produced from Arabic by the metropolitan abunä ↗Sälama “the Translator” before 1388 (ed. van den Oudenrijn 1959: 112–69, cp. 170–80 and Beylot 1988: 186–93, with the intriguing story of the portrait of Jesus by his disciple John, ed. Id. 1993:676 and 678, §41f.). An incomplete résumé of the Martyrdom can be found, since the 15th cent., in a few manuscripts of the ↗Täʾammərä Maryam (ed. Cerulli 1964: 14–29, cp. Beylot 1988: 194f.).

The Martyrdom is, to a certain extent, the continuation of another Arabic piece of the Egyptian-Ethiopian apocryphal cycle of P.: the Lament of ↗Mary or Lament of the Virgin, which makes Gamaliel even more important as an author (or a source) and is equally attributed to Cyriacus of Behnesa (ed. Galtier 1912; for the Coptic fragments s. Luisier 1996: 416 and n. 31, and esp. Suciu 2012). Transmitted also in ġaršūnī (ed. Mingana 1928: 459–88 [211–40]), it was translated into Gəᶜəz as ↗Laḥa Maryam (where the Virgin Mary, lamenting at the empty tomb of Jesus, is conflated with ↗Mary Magdalene), again by abunä Sälama. It is part of the ↗Gəbrä ḥəmamat, the lectionary of the Holy Week that is still read in the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church (ed. van den Oudenrijn 1959: 2–83, cp. 84–110 and Beylot 1988: 181–86 and Luisier 1996: 421–25).

A third piece of the same dossier is the passion narrative known in Ethiopic as Mäṣḥafä ↗dorho, so named after the tale it contains of the cock roasted by Akrosənna (the wife of Simon the Pharisee) and resurrected by Jesus. Also translated from Arabic into Gəᶜəz by Sälama, it is likewise included in the Gəbrä ḥəmamat. It ultimately goes back to a now lost 5th/6th-cent. Greek original from ↗Jerusalem, on which the newly-discovered Arabic version is dependent via a hitherto unknown Coptic intermediary (Piovanelli 2005: 433–37 and Lucchesi 2005: 92).

Two Ethiopic hymns to P. as a saint, a ↗mälkəᶜ and a ↗sälam, are appended to the Laḥa Maryam in the 18th-cent. ms. BN, éth. d’Abb. 177 (= CRAbb 89); they are available in English and French translations, resp. (Cerulli 1973: 150–54 and 1975–76).

Prophecy in Ethiopian culture

P., or supernatural revelations about the future told to a third party, either those in charge or even the public in general, are a common feature in most Ethiopian cultures. In contrast to other forms of divination (s. ↗Oracles and divination), P. cannot be asked for on demand, but is received spontaneously – a feature directly derived from its Christian and Judaic roots (Schmitt 1992: 482). The Gəᶜəz word for this kind of spontaneous P. is ትንቢት (tənbit) or ተነብዮ(ት) (tänäbəyo(t)) meaning "prophecy, oracle, prediction". The word tənbit is directly taken into Amharic and Təgrəñña, meaning "prophecy, prediction, forecast". In contrast to ራእይ (raᵓəy, "vision, revelation, apocalypse") tənbit or raᵓəyä tənbit describe the act of speaking out the vision seen in a raᵓəy or ሕልም (ḥəlm, "dream, vision"). Prophetic revelations, especially concerning approaching danger or opportunities, are often revealed in visions and dreams (e.g., the visions in Ferenc 1976: 249–50 [text] = 275–76 [tr.]; the visitation of the archangel Rufaᵓel in Marrassini 1995: 51 [text] = 85 [tr.]; or the voice calling from heaven in a dream in Raineri 1990: 22, 24 [text] = 23, 25 [tr.]). Oral P. are not only made by ↗saints, ↗holy men and ↗hermits (baḥtawəyan [sg. baḥtawi], ḫəbuᵓan, ↗səwwuran, nazrawəyan [sg. nazrawi]), but also by laymen and lay women (cp. PankSoc 263).

P. in its Christian form, however, does not mean divination by a seer or sibyl (Boring 1992: 495) and has to be distinguished from the broader term P., which has falsely been used to subsume different practices in Ethiopian and African cultures, as, e.g., the translation of the Oromo term raga as "prophecy" shows, which should, however, be better described as oracles and divination (s. also ↗Qaalluu, ↗Qalləčča).

The identification of Christian hermitage with the gift of P. is so strong, that Ethiopian hermits trace back their roots to Biblical prophets, such as Elijah and Elisha. As P. is an inherent part of being a hermit, in hagiographic texts (↗Hagiography, ↗Gädl, ↗Sənkəssar) predicting the future is often mentioned as one of the holy deeds carried out by saints (e.g., Conti Rossini 1910: 79f. [text] = 72 [tr.]; Grébaut 1908: 414; Marrassini 1981: 26, 31, 38, 40 [text] = 27, 32, 39, 41 [tr.]; Wajnberg 1936: 16, 30, 52, 54, 58, 90, 92 [text] = 17, 31, 53, 55, 59, 91, 93 [tr.]), next to ↗healing, performing miracles, communicating with ↗angels and taming wild beasts or ↗demons. For the Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church P. is counted as one of the essential spiritual gifts, as has already been mentioned in the Bible by St. Paul, even as the second most significant gift next to love (Boring 1992: 500).

In the Islamic tradition, the ↗Qurᵓān and the prophetic traditions (ḥadīṯ) may sometimes be used for divination (s., e.g., WagFath 126f.). Muslim holy men (↗Walī) may also pray for revelations of the future in duᶜāᵓ prayer ceremonies. Spontaneous P. by Muslim holy men in Ethiopia is not often recorded; still, some examples of Islamic P. are commemorated in oral traditions. One example of written Muslim P. is the ↗Fatḥ Madīnat Harar, in which the Muslim saint ↗Abādir ᶜUmar ar-Riḍā foresees the Italian conquest of Ethiopia (WagFath 130f.).

Christian P. has a long literary tradition and many prophetic visions and predictions mentioned in Christian scriptures serve as examples for the Ethiopian experience (s., e.g., Ferenc 1976: 243–94, the hagiographic account being substantiated by quotations from the Bible; s. also GuiLett 41; ↗Prophets, biblical; ↗Pseudepigrapha and Apocrypha; Wisdom of ↗Sibyl).

Moreover, P. has often been recorded in Ethiopian written sources and literature and has even influenced political decisions (↗Historiography). Wars were waged, royal settlements and monasteries were established, heirs were appointed, new kings were chosen and the date of their enthronement was fixed on the basis of P. However, not only political decisions were based on P., even whole political and religious movements were founded on it. P. was thus often used by political and religious leaders to justify their claims for power. Some prominent historical examples are: firstly the overthrow of the ↗Zagʷe dynasty and aṣe ↗Yətbaräk by ↗Yəkunno Amlak, which had been prophesied by a holy man (BudHist 285), probably ↗Iyäsus Moᵓa. Secondly the founding of ↗Gondär as the first Ethiopian royal capital by ↗Fasilädäs, who was led there by dreams and miracles, as well as a long foretold P. about the royal abode of Lǝbnä Dǝngǝl's descendants starting with the letter G. (Pankhurst 1969: 177f.). Thirdly the ascent to the throne by ↗Iyasu I was foretold by his mother Śäblä Wängel (GuiIohan 60 [text] = 58f. [tr.]). Fourthly the claim to the throne by ↗Iyasu II was justified by a P. of the female saint ↗Wälättä Ṗeṭros (GuiIyas 15–18 [text] = 13–16 [tr.]) and a vision by his mother ↗Mǝntǝwwab (GuiIyas 18f. [text] = 17ff. [tr.]) as well as the Queen's brother (GuiIyas 20 [text] = 19f. [tr.]; s. also dynastic ↗genealogy).

↗Tewodros II even chose his royal name deliberately, justifying his claim to the throne by several written P., which predicted a mystical king, named Tewodros, who would unify the empire (RubTew 49ff.; ↗Fǝkkare Iyäsus; GuiLett 42f.; s. also Apocalypse of ↗Pseudo-Methodios).

As for modern history, only a few chosen examples will be given: aṣe ↗Mǝnilǝk II's settling on ↗Ǝnṭoṭṭo mountain (GSMen 97) was based on a written P., found in a manuscript at the monastery of Däbrä Ṣǝyon (↗Tulluu Guddoo). On another occasion, the P. of approaching danger to his kingdom forced Mǝnilǝk not to spend the rainy season in Boru, Wällo, but to return to Ǝnṭoṭṭo, where his appointed official Gobäna had fallen ill and died shortly after (BTafA 802 [text] = 803 [tr.]). Later, several P., of which one was made by a Harari Muslim šayḫ (fieldnotes of Müller 2003), foretold the reign of aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śǝllase I.

Prophetic revelations are also mentioned in travel accounts (e.g., BruNile, vol. 2, 554, 606f.; vol. 3, 177) and even inspired modern ↗Amharic literature, such as the novel Yätǝnbit qäṭäro by ↗Käbbädä Mikaᵓel. Compared to Western culture, in which some sort of belief in P. still exists to a minimal extent in broader society (s. Lewinsohn 1961 [1958]), but is a taboo topic for modern science, in Ethiopia the belief in P. can still be found at all levels of society, crossing all ethnic and religious boundaries. P. influences individual lives as much as political decisions (s. Newman 1998).

In many evangelical churches P. in combination with confession and exorcism of demons are inherent parts of church services (↗Protestantism).

Even today charismatic figures with a Christian Orthodox background, who establish themselves in the tradition of O.T. pre-exilic prophets foretelling doom and preaching repentance (Schmitt 1992: 484, 487, Barton 1992: 489) speak publicly against the church or the government. A recent example is baḥtawi Gäbrä Mäsqäl, who was arrested by the police in 1993 for teaching in Addis Abäba (Anon. Feb./Mar. 1993: 40f.). After his release (Anon. Mar/Apr. 1993a: 32ff.) he married and set up a welfare organization called "Mekane Hizunan Welfare and Assistance Organization" near Bole Mädḫane ᶜAläm Church, which is supported by several non-Ethiopians, such as the famous Afro-American singer Lauryn Hill (s. video by Andrew Laurence, 2006). A recent example of the abundant P. connected to Tewodros is abba Ammǝḫa Iyäsus, who was active during 1992 and 1993 in Gondär town, until he was arrested on 7 September 1993 (Resource Information Center 1994: 26). He had gathered more than 1,000 followers at the church where he was preaching and prophesied a king named Tewodros coming from Gondär and bringing peace and justice to Ethiopia (for the long history of this recurring P. s. also BruNile vol. 2, 64; vol. 4, 129f.; BudHist 475). He remained in prison for 15 years and was released only recently (field notes of Müller 2012).

Ethiopia is furthermore mentioned in several P. and the Biblical sentence "Ethiopia shall stretch out her hands to God" (Pro 68:31; s. UllBibl 9, 14) has been a source of great expectations for some, e.g., for Rastafarians who see Ethiopia as the Promised Land (↗Rastafari).

Angela M. Müller

R

Rodén, Karl Gustav

Reverend R. (b. 27 August 1860, d. 23 November 1943) was a scholar and missionary of the Swedish Evangelical Mission (SEM; s. ↗Evangeliska Fosterlands Stiftelsen).

R. studied at the Johannelunds Teologiska Institut from 1877–83, where he became acquainted with ↗Onesimos Näsib and Karl ↗Cederqvist (s. EAE vol. 5), both of whom were later missionaries in Eritrea and Ethiopia.

As a missionary R. was based in different stations of the SEM in Eritrea: ↗Ǝmkullu 1885, ↗Ḥərgigo 1887, ↗Gäläb (s. EAE vol. 5) 1890–1900 and 1903–20, ↗Asmära 1901–02. He returned to Uppsala in 1921. When R. and his wife Emelie Rodén (née Nilsson) came to Gäläb for the second time, they were accompanied by ↗Dawit Amanuʾel and Alazar Ḥəmmäd, two of the earliest Evangelical Christians among the ↗Təgre.

During a severe famine (ca. 1890) R. supervised the repair of one of the roads from the coast to the interior, in order to assure food supply. The initiative was well received by Governor Ferdinando ↗Martini who later paid a visit to Gäläb in 1905 and expressed his pleasure. R. was allowed to build a mission house in ↗Kärän and had the full support of the regional commissioner, V. Fioccardi. Martini also gave a gift of 1,000 Lira for the printing of Feteḥ Maḥārī, R.'s study on the people of ↗Mänsa^{c}. R. was often consulted by the colonial authorities on issues relating to tribal customs, language, culture etc. and he gathered ethnographical and ornithological data and objects, the latter in cooperation with G. Schrader.

R. gave much of his time to literary production in Təgre. As editor, supervisor or publisher, he collaborated with a number of people, who however, were rarely credited for their part in the work: ↗Täwäldä Mädḫən Gäbrä Mädḫən, Dawit Amanuʾel, Karl ↗Winqvist, Yəsḥaq (Giuseppe) Ḥəmmäd, A. Renlund and Axel Jonsson.

While producing a translation of the ↗New Testament (N.T.) into Təgre, R. had serious arguments with ↗Sundström and Täwäldä Mädḫən Gäbrä Mädḫən about the correct spelling of Təgre words. The conflict was so severe that the printing of the N.T. had to be delayed for two years. In 1906–07 R. worked on a revision of the Amharic N.T. together with aläqa ↗Tayyä Gäbrä Maryam in Berlin, Germany, under the auspices of the ↗British and Foreign Bible Society. On 6 June R. personally handed over a copy of his Le tribù dei Mensa to the Italian monarch, ↗Vittorio Emanuele III, when the Italian king and queen paid a visit to the Swedish Royal House.

Several of R.'s works remain unpublished: a translation of the ↗Old Testament (up to 1 Chr); a Grammar of Təgre; a Təgre-Swedish, Swedish-Təgre Dictionary; Bible Knowledge (introduction to books of the ↗Bible, in Təgre); a translation of the N.T. (Acts and Romans) into Amharic, with aläqa Tayyä.

Rom

R. (ሮም, also ሮምያ Romya, ሮሜ Rome) is the name used at different times in Ethiopian literature to designate both Byzantium or, more generally the ↗Byzantine Empire and the city of Rome or, more generally, the Latin people (Romawəyan); it is the Ethiopic equivalent of the Arabic term Rūm.

The patriarch Alfonso ↗Mendes, in 1651, identifies the toponym Rum with Thrace (Greece). He also adds that R. is called by the Latin troops and colonies Romania while by the Orientals Rum (Rumes its inhabitants; BecRASO VIII, 70f.). Hiob ↗Ludolf registers the form Rome (LudHist Ib. III, ch. III, § 1f.).

In hagiographic literature, R. frequently features as the place of origin of the foreign saints. Some of the Aksumite saints are said to have come from R., such as ↗Ṗänṭälewon zäṣomaᶜt, Yəsḥaq (↗Gärima), ↗Zämikaᵓel Arägawi, ↗Oṣ and the ↗Ṣadəqan. These saints are also known in the Mäṣḥafä ↗məsṭir as Qəddusanä Rom 'the saints of Rom' (YaqBeyMist I, 122 [text]). R. is also the place where abba ↗Kiros was born.

The toponym is attested in Ethiopian literature since its very beginning, as testified, e.g., by some hagiographies included in the archaic collection of Gädlä ↗sämaᶜətat. There, the term is mostly (but non exclusively) used to refer to Byzantium; it is found in the Acts of such martyrs as (1) Arsonofis, Ṗeṭros and Askiryon (Martyrium of the soldiers Arsenofis, Peter and Askirion, cf. Conti Rossini 1938); (2) Askänafer (Martyrium of Askänafer the governor); (3) Elewtəros and Ǝntəya (Martyrium of Elewtəros and his mother Ǝntəya); (4) Ewosṭatewos (Martyrium of Eustathius, his wife and his two children); (5) Fasilädäs (Martyrium of Basilides the composition of which is attributed to Kələstyanos – Celestine I – Pope of Rom, cf. Pereira 1907); (6) ↗Gäbrä Krəstos (Life of Saint Alexis, cf. Cerulli 1969); (7) Herenewos (Martyrium of Irenaeus, Bishop of Sirmium); (8) Mäkbəyu (Martyrium of Makbeyu and her seven chidren); (9) Mamas, Tewodoṭos, Tewofina (Martyrium of Mamas, Tewodoṭos and his wife Tewofina); (10) Märqorewos Ṗilobader (Martyrium of Mercurios Philopater, cf. Nollet 1931; Proverbio 1993); (11) Sofya, Ṗisṭis, Alapis, Agaṗis (Martyrium of Sophia, and her daughters Pistis, Elpis and Agapis); (12) Tewoqriṭos Ǝnagnosṭis (Martyrium of Theocritus the lector); (13) Ṭaṭus (Martyrium of Ṭaṭus); (14) Yasay (Martyrium of abba Yasay; Schneider 1963).

The toponym R., referring to both Byzantium and Rome, is also attested in several miracles of the ↗Täᵓammərä Maryam (CerMaria 179, 344, passim). A cycle of tales in this collection is directly connected with the tradition of the medieval city of Rome (ibid. 408–71 ["I racconti medievali di Roma"]).

R. is also mentioned in the Ethiopic ↗Sənkəssar.

Rom

R. (ሮም) is the name given, in oral traditions of the ↗Bilin and ↗Təgre-speaking people, to the early medieval ↗Beǧa settlers of Eritrean and Northern Ethiopia highlands, partly also of the ↗Red Sea coasts, who migrated around the 8th cent. A.D. with the decline of the Kingdom of ↗Aksum. Parallel and corresponding oral traditions of the ↗Təgrəñña-speaking people designate them as Bäläw (↗Balaw). The name of the R. is possibly a result of their identification with people coming from the Mediterranean "↗Rom", i.e. from the Byzantine empire (cp. Ar. Rūm) and the Mediterranean Sea (cf. Reinisch 1887:290; PerChron 487–90 [tr.]), and is used for the Beǧa by Arab authors (Ibn Ḥawqal).

Actually traditions from ↗Säraye attribute an origin from "Rom" to the Bäläw (Conti Rossini 1942: 130, n. 2) and traditions from the ↗Irob also claim an origin from "Rome" for their name (cf. Reinisch 1878: 89f.; PerChron 489; Conti Rossini 1910: 884, n. 1, 893, 900).

R. (i.e. Beğa) people occupying Eritrean and northern Ethiopian highlands were later replaced by further waves of ↗Agäw immigrants (the Bilin first, s. ↗Migrations EAE vol. 5; cf. Fiaccadori 2010: 193 ff.), most of whom were Semitized in the course of time (e.g., the ↗Adkämä Məlgaʾ). Evidence of R.'s presence from the Red Sea coast (e.g., near Massawa, cf. Reinisch 1888: 713) to the ↗Gaš valley, however, widely survive both in oral traditions and in ethnonyms and place names (summary in CRStor 276ff.). Bilin tales tell of R.'s cow robberies and also depict them as the first (i.e. the previous) inhabitants of the land, who were fiercely punished by God for their arrogance and haughtiness, and finally disappeared under heaps of stones and were replaced by the Barya (↗Kunama; cf. Reinisch 1883: 6–9, §§ 2f.). Təgre tales equally portray R. as nomadic, giant (cf. "Romāy" in LitPEA IV, 470, no. 307, n.), exceptionally fierce and strong people (a feature probably accounting for Tgn. romay 'large spear; person of herculean proportions', cf. KaneTDic 549) who are fond of songs, bread cows and pasture their flocks everywhere (LitPEA I–II, no. 73); a legend has it that they put an end to their life by digging their own graves and built up "the stones of their tombs like a hut over them", leaving "no known village or settlement, because they were uncivilized and roaming herdsmen only" (ibid. no. 74).

R. is also attested as an element in personal names: e.g., simply R. (CRAxum II [tr.], 90.32 [R. is a daña bäʿalä wak̲o], 91.25), Rom Gänäyäla (PerrZarY 4 [var.], 14), Rom Sägäd (CRHist [text] 8, 18 etc.; Conti Rossini 1942: 128, 198; KrLebD 53, 61 [text]), Rom Zämäda (Conti Rossini 1923: 465); as well as in placenames: e.g., May Romi (Id. 1942:202, n. 4, near "Debebti", in the territory of "Egri-Machèl"). Islamized people called Arom (very likely the same as R.), ruled by a queen Faṭəma, were fought by aṣe ↗Susənyos, who sent baḥər nägaš ↗Gäbrä Maryam against them, at a place 8-day march from ↗Šire (cf. PerChron [§ 55], 211f. [text] = 163 [tr.]); "Arùm", a Hadendoa tribe, are also known in oral traditions from the Barka valley collected by Conti Rossini; later still, in the 17th cent., "Rumes" are mentioned in Portuguese sources as dwelling in both coast and inland regions of Eritrea and Təgray (cf., e.g., Beccari 1903: 420, 422, 428, 436; BecRASO XV, 295 s.v. "Rum et Rumes").

The "Tombs of the Rom" (to which the so-called "houses of the Dom" can be assimilated) are scattered in a vast area of the northern Eritrean lowland in the form of stone-heap ruins (cf. LitPEA II, fig. 11 in front of p. 94; CRStor pl. LXV, fig. 208). They consist of a 2-m wide polygonal circle, enclosed by big stones and slabs driven into the ground and emerging with an about 0.5-m elevation. It has been hitherto unnoticed that "stones of R." are also mentioned in the Mäṣḥafä ↗Aksum (CRAxum II [tr.], 4, 11). In the absence of any serious archaeological survey of the Eritrean lowlands, it is extremely difficult to assess context and chronology of settlements attributed to the R. or even their actual association with them (cf. Fattovich 1992: 31; Conti Rossini 1922).

Alessandro Bausi

Rombulo, Pietro

R. (pron. [Ròmbulo]; b. 1385/90, Messina, d. after 1450) was an Italian traveller and adventurer and one of the first Europeans to have spent many years – 37 years – living in Ethiopia.

R. arrived there in 1407 (or 1413) and soon attained a high rank at the local court. He eventually became a confidant of aṣe ↗Zärʾa Yaʿəqob, who, between 1444 and 1448, dispatched him several times as ambassador to ↗India, and once to Ceylon (to buy gems for the emperor) as well as on a four-year journey to ↗China ("Catai"; s. de Witte 1956: 288 and n. 5).

In the same capacity, R. was sent to Pope Nicholas V and to King Alfonso I of Naples (↗Alfonso V of Aragon) in 1450 (Cerone 1902: 71, 64ff., 83; de Witte 1956: 288f.), together with "Fra Michele" (i.e. abba Mikaʾel), "prior of the church of Gudaber" (also known as "Gedabar": between ↗Bärara and ↗Däbrä Bərhan?) and "Bumar moro" (↗Moors, s. EAE vol. 5) or "Anamer Jundi" (*Abū ʿUmar [al-]Zanǧī?). In Rome, on 20 May 1450, R. and the other Ethiopian envoys received a littera passus ('pass') from the pope (Città del Vaticano, Archivio Segreto Vaticano, Reg. Vat. 411, fol. 312v, ed. in de Witte 1956: 295). In Naples, R. was visited by the Dominican bishop, humanist and ambassador Pietro Ranzano (also Ransano/-ni, Lat. Petrus Ransanus; b. 1426/27, Palermo, d. 1492/93), who collected from both R. and his (otherwise unknown) writings several details on his life as well as on contemporary Ethiopia and its neighbours. Ranzano integrated these details, though rather unsystematically, in the sections devoted to India and Africa of his Annales omnium temporum ('Annals of All Times'), which he started drafting before 1460 (Figliuolo 1997:164ff.).

Ranzano's Annales, a huge (and unfinished) chronological work, are still largely unpublished (résumé in Termini 1915: 85–106). The only parts to be printed are a few sections on Italy, later exploited by Leandro Alberti (Figliuolo 1997: 200; Petrella 2003: 168–72 and 2004: 42–58), and on Hungary, where the author had been an ambassador for three years (Kulcsár 1977), as well as on Cyprus, the Ottoman sultan (↗Ottoman empire) and Tamerlane (Figliuolo 1997: 201–44). The fourth of the original eight volumes in-folio has been lost. The remaining seven are kept in Palermo, Biblioteca Comunale, mss. 3. Qq. C. 54–60 (cp. Boglino 1900: 226). Only vol. 2 (ms. 3. Qq. C. 55) was copied from Ranzano's autograph, now lost (Id. 1892: 273, a unique circumstance, yet unnoticed in Trasselli 1941 and CrawItin 5–8). The manuscript contains books VIII and IX, with lengthy notes on India and Africa, for which Ranzano is likely to have used R.'s personal diary (Figliuolo 1997: 186).

In Annales VIII, 11 (fols. 91ff.), R.'s biography is retold from his personal recollections: he went to Ethiopia as a young man, at the time of King David, i.e. aṣe ↗Dawit II. Previously, R. had travelled to Spain, France, Italy and ↗Egypt, where he had spent four years. In Ethiopia, he married a wealthy and noble lady (elsewhere, "Maria", i.e. Maryam, s. de Witte 1956: 288 n. 3), and had eight children, seven of them living in 1450. He stayed there for 37 years (i.e. 1407–44 or 1413–50), earning the monarch's confidence and even becoming his ambassador (fols. 98ff. of the ms. are devoted to R.'s missions to India and China: outward journey by ship, returning by land). Book IX is devoted first to Africa as a whole (ch. 9, fols. 250ff.) and then to Ethiopia (fols. 288v–93r, 296v–301v).

In Ranzano's narrative, R.'s record on Ethiopia is hopelessly mixed with traditional beliefs and various legendary elements, often taken from classical sources (s. Fera 1988), as well as with reliable reports of other travellers. However, the arrangement of the text makes the sources indiscernible from one another (for a summary of the few certain data, with a list of identifiable place names, s. CrawItin 5–8; full text in Trasselli 1941).

The historicity of Ranzano's report on R.'s mission to Alfonso V (I as king of Naples, since 1442) is confirmed by other sources. Among them is Alfonso's reply to Zärʾa Yaʿəqob on 18 September 1450 (ms. Barcelona, Arxiu de la Corona d'Aragó, Reg. 2658, fol. 57, where R. is referred to as "Pero Rombolo de Messina vassallo nostro e servitore", in Cerone 1902: 64f., but s. de Witte 1956: 288 n. 4), with the promise of cooperation and mutual assistance, and esp. of sending craftsmen and artisans as well as precious textiles if their security conditions could be guaranteed. The same letter also discloses the fact that R. had already visited Rome and the pope (not the other way round, as in EAE vol. 3, 237). As noted by Ranzano, R.'s mission was an event of some significance, which impressed a large community including envoys from all over the known world. Yet, R.'s intention to surprise the king of Naples with astonishing news might be ultimately related to the disappointing results of the mission itself in terms of its political effectiveness and trade perspectives.

R. could be one and the same as "a Neapolitan of the city of Naples who was called Peter of Naples" met by Bertrandon de La Broquière in Constantinople in 1432 (s. Munro-Hay 2006: 109ff. and Fiaccadori in preparation). A native or a subject of the kingdom of Naples (cp. "vassallo nostro e servitore" in Alfonso's letter above), Peter hailed from, or claimed connection with, its capital, indeed more prestigious than Messina. Accompanied to Ethiopia by a Frenchman and a Spanishman who both died in 1430, he later reached Constantinople in the service of aṣe ↗Yǝsḥaq, possibly with the aim of hiring craftsmen and skilled artisans. From there he might have brought pictorial models, namely Byzantine icons, to Ethiopia. Peter went to Ethiopia before 1416, not necessarily as an envoy of John Duke of Berry, and married there (Schefer 1892: 142ff.). Both the timing of his sojourn in Ethiopia and the circumstances of his marriage are strikingly similar to R.'s, seven of whose children were alive in 1450, during the Neapolitan mission, which offers a terminus post quem for his death.

Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Roux, Marius-Honoré

R. (b. 19 March 1874, Marseille, d. 12 October 1954, Paris) was a French diplomat and Freemason (↗Freemasonry, s. EAE vol. 5). Of modest origins, he arrived in Ethiopia in the early 1890s as a young employee of the Eastern Telegraph Co Ltd established at Perim (Mayyūn). He then began working for the governor of the French colony of ↗Obock, Léonce ↗Lagarde, to whom he delivered information on English and Italian activities.

In 1894, R. joined the recently established administration at Obock. On 10 August 1898, he joined the Colonial Office as Technical Officer of Native Affairs in ↗Djibouti and on 24 December 1900 he became dragoman responsible for the Chancery of the Legation of ↗France in Ethiopia under the authority of Minister Plenipotentiary Léonce Lagarde. From October 1899 to June 1900, in Harär, he was diplomatic attaché of the French legation based in Addis Abäba. In 1905 he also worked as an interpreter.

A long-time Freemason, R. founded, on 1 September 1909, the French lodge "Light of Ethiopia" in Addis Abäba. The lodge was first active on an interim basis and on 9 February 1910 it was incorporated permanently under the obedience of the Grand Orient de France. Consisting of not more than 20 members, it was formed mostly of Greek or Armenian merchants and also included such figures as ↗Wärqənäh Ešäte (Dr. Martin) and Alexis ↗Desvages. Its chief aim, besides propagating Masonic ideals, was the spread of French influence in the region.

The Masonic experience in Ethiopia was short-lived but had enduring effects. Its members, themselves influential figures in the press, education and printing milieu, were to form a generation of Ethiopian intellectuals that assisted ras Täfäri (↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I) in his efforts to modernize the country.

R. left Ethiopia in 1911 and took the office of chancellor in charge of the Vice-Consulate of France in Al-Hudaydah, Yemen. After a short period as prisoner of the Turks, from November 1914 to February 1915, he pursued his diplomatic career. He held positions in Cairo, Port Said, Baghdad, Galaţi, La Coruña, Riga and Lagos. On 25 January 1934, he retired and on 13 August 1937 he was awarded the Legion of Honour.

R. married twice. In 1904, he married Angles, a French woman of high status but the couple soon divorced. In 1913 he remarried in Addis Abäba and divorced again in 1923.

S

Säᶜatat: Mäṣḥafä säᶜatat

The S. (መጽሐፈ ፡ ሰዓታት, ‘Book of Hours’, ‘Horologium’, also simply ሰዓታት or ሰዐታት, Säᶜatat, ‘Hours’) is a Church service made up of psalms, biblical readings and hymns. Arranged to be said at fixed hours of night and day, the readings are called by these same hours in order to achieve a form of perpetual prayer leading to union with God. This way of prayer, also called “canonical hours”, was born in the desert of Egypt and elsewhere, first in monastic communities.

There has been very little study of S., including in the local languages (HabUff 40). Taft (1986: 266) identified four types of S. that have been in use in Ethiopia, neither of them properly studied: 1) the Coptic S. (Säᶜatat zägəbṣ, hereafter S.^{1}); 2) the S. of abba ↗Giyorgis of Sägla/Gasəčč̣a (hereafter S.^{2}); 3) a S. that includes the entire ↗Psalter in the daily pensum (S.^{3}); 4) the cursus of prayers found in ms. Vat. Aeth. 21 (15th cent.) and some other manuscripts (S.^{4}).

Only S.^{1} and S.^{2} are actually major Ethiopic S. S.^{3} reminds of what is found elsewhere (Zanetti 1990: 357–63), but with a different distribution. The Ethiopic witnesses (at least mss. Vat. Aeth. 15 and EMML no. 2097) “with no psalms at compline or in the midnight office, but with thirty psalms and three canticles in each of the other five hours” (Taft 1986: 270) follow obviously the Ethiopian distribution of the Psalter in 15 nəguś or set of ten psalms, prescribed in the ↗Dəggʷa for a whole week (HabUff 173–77). Although it is organized in hours, S.^{4} (described in GréTisVat I, 75–100, commented Salaville 1936 = 1940) is not actually a S. but a genre of its own, called ጊዜ ፡ ጸሎት (Gize ṣälot, ‘Time of Prayer’), for the use of ↗hermits (baḥtawiyan) and recluses (yäzäggu).

S.^{1} is entirely taken from the Copto-Arabic tradition, with some parts maybe taken directly from the Greek. It is found in a large number of manuscripts. It was edited by Turaev (1897) from eleven manuscripts, with few variant readings mentioned in the footnotes (ibid. p. V). Van Lantschoot (1940) translated Turaev’s text into Latin for the use of the ↗Sacra Congregatio pro Ecclesiis Orientalibus, and identified each single part of it (except one prayer p. 102f.), with the help of two additional manuscripts from the ↗Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana (Vat. Aeth. 1 and 57). The Roman liturgical edition (1952) claims to be based on a number of manuscripts, but gives no more detail.

Compared to the Coptic Hours (called Aǧbīya, Burmester 1973), S.^{1} contains additional material taken from the Coptic Psalmodia (mainly the Psalis and the Theotokia [i.e. ↗Wəddase Maryam]), from the Euchologion (prayers), but also prayers and troparia found in the Greek Horologium (and not in the Aǧbīya), as well as some parts from S.^{2}, and even prayers found exclusively in a Maronite Horologium printed in Rome in 1584. A deeper study, analyzing a large number of manuscripts, is needed.

Some manuscripts of S.^{1} have a “Service at the Cockcrow”, which, in fact, is a part of the Coptic Psalmodia, with additions; it is given as such both in Turaev’s edition and in the Roman edition of S.^{1} (the latter being more developed; cf. Quecke 1970: 18f.).

S.^{1} continued to be copied for a long time; e.g., the 19th-cent. ms. EMML no. 4419 includes “the beginning of the Coptic Horologium, f. 103b” (EMML X, 143). It is no longer in use, except a partial survival in the ↗Gəbrä ḥəmamat, Egyptian in origin and character.

The date of translation into ↗Gəᶜəz is unknown; there are no documents ascribing the translation to abunä ↗Sälama “the Translator”. According to the teachers of the ↗Qəddase bet, S.^{1} was spread by the 13th-cent. abunä ↗Täklä Haymanot and his monastic network.

S.^{2}, presently in liturgical use throughout Ethiopia and Eritrea, is particularly difficult to treat. The identification of the original work, the circumstances that created the need for this new composition, the time when it was made (14th-cent. abba Giyorgis was probably still at the court of the emperor), came in use and eventually replaced the S.^{1}, its performance and its edition are among the problems to be faced.

The Acts of abba Giyorgis of Sägla (nicknamed Bäᶜalä Säᶜatat, 'The Composer of the [Book of] Hours'), report that he composed a text entitled Maṣḥafä səbḥat zämäᶜalt wäzälelit zäläläsäᶜatu wäzäzäṣotahu wäzäsämäyo mäṣḥafä bərhan ('Book of Praise for the Day and for the Night, for Each Hour and Each Mode, named Book of the Light'; s. Colin 1987: 22 [text] = 16 [tr.]). The original S.^{2} seems to be very close to, if not identical with, a particular book identified by the monks as the personal work of Giyorgis (ms. Gasəč̣č̣a 18, photographed by Marie-Laure Derat in 1993; not yet described). Among other witnesses of S.^{2} are mss. EMML no. 4016 (s. EMML X, 8: 1746–55, with the Horologium for the Day [Säᶜatat zämäᶜalt]) and BN Eth. 381 = Griaule 77 (s. StrGriaule 12–16), which seem to be a hybrid of S.^{1} and S.^{2}.

The printed editions in use derive from S.^{2}, the standard being the Asmära edition of 1983. They differ from the manuscript versions in the following points: the whole Night Hours are given as one service without reference to particular hours; the 8th, 9th and 10th Hour are not printed; most of the numerous readings have been suppressed; the long Prayer of the 'Laying on of the Hand' (Anbərotä əd), including many saints of the O.T., has also been discarded. Täsfa Gäbrä Śəllase claims that he made a critical edition by emending the additions made by later authors (1955; HabUff 270).

It is not yet clear when S.^{2} replaced S.^{1} in use. It has been suggested that the 15th-cent. aṣe ↗Zärᵓa Yaᶜəqob was responsible for spreading S.^{2} (Derat in MiscAethKur 55; cp. PerrZarY 51). The version of the ↗Täᵓammərä Maryam in ms. EMML no. 2275 (Däfäro Maryam, Ankobär, Šäwa; first half of the 16th cent.; copied from a late 15th-cent. ms.; Getatchew Haile 1982: 68) contains a miracle that made monks switch from S.^{1} to S.^{2}, indicating that there was a strong trend to using S.^{2} relatively shortly after Giyorgis's death in ca. 1426.

The reason for the composition of S.^{2} may have been a development in ↗Mariology. Giyorgis's presence among the kahənatä däbtära (priests of the royal camp) must have placed favourably the new service book.

According to the traditional scholars, S.^{2} was universally received much later, when the Sällälkulla ↗zema came in use for the ↗Qəddase, before the spread of the school of ↗Däbrä Abbay in the 19th cent., after the time of aṣe ↗Tewodros II.

The monks of Gasəč̣č̣a still use the service of S.^{2} The complete service takes them from 9 o'clock p.m. to 7 o'clock a.m. to complete. If they happen to be not numerous enough (at least five trained persons are necessary), they use the shorter, printed version and the section of the ↗Səbḥatä fəqur, which it takes one hour to complete. They never do the Day Hours.

Ethiopian ↗monasteries of the andənnät style (the "coenobites") do not sing the "cathedral office" (↗Maḫlet) but only celebrate the S. all the year round together with the ↗Wəddase Amlak, also organised in hours. At main feasts, if many people attend, the Maḫlet may be sung even in these monasteries, but then it is normally done by external singers, not by the monks themselves, who would not attend. In all other churches S. replaces the Maḫlet during the nights of ↗Lent and of the Fast of the ↗Fəlsäta, except its eve. It is possible to shorten the service on the occasion of funerals: one would then begin at "Mikaᵓel" and continue directly with the Səbḥatä fəqur.

The Ṣälotä əṭan (↗Incense) is always done during the execution of the S., always immediately followed by the Ṣälotä ↗kidan.

The S. of the ↗Ṣomä dəggʷa are taken from S.^{2}, despite the conservative character of the Lenten season (↗Calendar, Christian).

Certain monastic churches (but not Gasəč̣č̣a) sing the Säᶜatat zämäᶜalt, also ascribed to abba Giyorgis and transmitted in a separate volume (so far unedited). A traditional centre for the teaching of these S. is the church of Däbrä Iyäsus, ca. 30 km from ↗Däbrä Wärq (Goǧǧam).

A Säᶜätatä dəngəl Maryam is mentioned in a Miracle of Mary (Budge 1933) but does not seem to exist as anything else but a translation-adaptation standing for the Salve Regina of Western sources.

Ṣägga Krəstos

Ṣ.K. (ጸጋ ፡ ክርስቶስ, in European sources "Zagachristo", "Saga Christos" and, more rarely, "Athanasio"; b. ca. 1608, d. 22 April 1638, Rueil-Malmaison, France) was an Ethiopian traveller who claimed to be an Ethiopian prince.

Ṣ.K.'s princely claims were the source of dispute during his lifetime. According to his host in Palestine, the Custodian of the Holy Land (1632-35) Paolo da Lodi, Ṣ.K. was the son of "Claudius" (i.e. Gälawdewos), king of the region of "Arzo" or "Narea" (i.e. ↗Ǝnnarya) and who was killed in 1607 by Susənyos (Somigli 1928: 9ff.; BecRASO I, 379); other sources have him as the son of one king Yaᶜəqob said to have been killed in 1628 and the brother of "Damiano" and "Cosimo" (Somigli 1928: 13, 32; Roger 1646: 349f.). On the contrary, the abba of the monastery of ↗Dayr al-Muḥarraq allegedly informed ↗Franciscan friars in Cairo that Ṣ.K. was an apostate monk from the order of "St. John Baptist"; the missionary Antonio da Virgoletta referred to Ṣ.K. as a "personaggio" (Somigli 1928: 5). More importantly, the Jesuit Patriarch Afonso ↗Mendes and Hiob ↗Ludolf called him "aretalogus" and "impostor", respectively, and both vehemently denied his noble claims (BecRASO XIII, 146f.; also IX, 253ff.; Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide; LudHist; cf. also Björnstahl 1780: 149). Indeed, during the ↗Jesuit mission in Ethiopia, no sources, European or Ethiopian, mention the name of Ṣ.K.

Ṣ.K. first appears in the historical record in early 1632 in Cairo. He claimed to having reached the Egyptian capital fleeing the persecution of aṣe Susənyos and after a long trip of over four years that took him first to ↗Sinnār (Somigli 1928: 10). In Cairo Ṣ.K. met Franciscan friars who helped him pursue his journey to Jerusalem. He resided for some time in Nazareth, hosted by Paolo da Lodi, in which town, on 29 June 1632, he also made solemn profession of Catholic faith (ibid. 7).

In late 1632, Ṣ.K. reached Rome. At the papal capital, he lived first at the Franciscan convent of San Francesco a Ripa and later, at the expenses of the ↗Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda, in San Pietro in Montorio. On 18 May 1633, he had an audience with Pope Urban VIII. Between 1634 and 1635, accompanied by Franciscan friars, among whom the agent of Propaganda Fide Antonio Dalla Porta (better known as Antonio da Virgoletta), he toured several Italian cities in seek of support for a grand project to return to Ethiopia. When this failed, he menaced to approach "enemy" nations such as Holland and England with the same purpose (Piazza 1986; BecRASO VIII, XXIII; Somigli 1928: 14, 19f.).

After having parted company with his Franciscan companions at Turin, in 1635, at the invitation of the French ambassador in Rome Charles I de Blanchefort, Marquis of Créquy, Ṣ.K. went to Paris. At the French capital he tried anew to gather support for his Ethiopian project. He was welcomed at the court of Louis XIII and received a pension. Suffering from an illness since his days in Italy, he died of pleurisy at the castle of Cardinal Richelieu in Rueil-Malmaison. He was buried there, the expenses being covered by Cardinal Richelieu (Roger 1646: 360; Dubois–Fontanelle 1775: 41f.; Björnstahl 1780: 149).

Regardless of Ṣ.K.'s mysterious identity, his presence in Europe had an impact. His arrival in Rome seems to have been the spark for the foundation, under the auspices of Propaganda Fide, of a second mission to Ethiopia. The mission was to be led by Franciscan friars and directly answerable to Rome, thus taking it away of the control of the Jesuit order and of Portugal (cf. Somigli 1928: 16, 22ff., 43f., 50). After his death, Ṣ.K.'s figure focused the attention of several European writers in the 17th and 18th cents. (Miller 1985: 35–38; Hoffmann 1973: 28f.; Pintard 1943: 259; cf. Störk in VarAeth). Moreover, Ṣ.K. allegedly took to Europe two important Ethiopian codices: one challenging Jesuit theology with the help of Zämikaᵓelite doctrines (published by Enrico Cerulli 1960); and a second containing the Arganonä Dəngəl (↗Arganonä Maryam). Both are preserved at the Bibliothèque Nationale (ZotBNat 97, 141; Somigli 1928: 48f.; Cerulli 1960: VIII–IX).

Śämrä Krəstos

Abunä Ś.K. (ሠምረ ፡ ክርስቶስ, lit. 'Christ was pleased'; fl. 14th cent., b. ᶜAdwa) was a monk and saint of the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church.

Information on Ś.K. is scarce. The only definite source on his life is his Vita (↗Gädl) and the collection of the miracles (↗Täᵓammər) attributed to him; both texts are still unedited and are preserved together in a single manuscript (ANLin 88, fols. 56ra–70rb, StrANL 231-35). This manuscript, which also contains the Vita of abba ↗Libanos, is a very recent copy, produced in 1939 (s. also Bausi 2003: IX).

According to Ś.K.'s hagiography (StrANL 231), his parents were Yaᶜəqob and Maryam Śämrä. He was initiated into monastic life by Bənyam of Däbrä Wifat (StrANL 231). Moreover, he is considered a contemporary of Metropolitan abba ↗Sälama.

Strelcyn (StrANL 231–34) gives a detailed description of the 21 miracles performed by Ś.K. during his lifetime and after death. Among the miracles are such curious ones as the stoning of three ravens who were sitting on the roof of the church of abba Mäṭaᶜ (Libanos), or the reviving of a cow which had died after it licked the saint's bowl. Two miracles mention a king and a queen, whose names are, however, not given.

The references to abba Mäṭaᶜ in the text possibly indicate a connection with Libanos' monastic foundations. In the Vita of ↗Samuᵓel of Däbrä Wägäg a disciple named Ś.K. is mentioned (Kur 1968, s. index), yet any identification is only speculative. Ś.K. should not be confused with a homonymous 15th-cent monk and teacher of aṣe ↗Ǝskəndər (s. EMML no. 1942, fol. 82r; EMML no. 2275, fol. 233v).

Savouré, Armand

S (b. 7 April 1855, Lardy, Essonne, d. 19 February 1940, Grasse, Alpes-Maritimes) was a French merchant. As a reserve serviceman, in 1885 he went to ↗Obock. There he established a partnership with Léon Barral, founding the company A. Savouré et Compagnie (1848–85). Later he also associated with his friend Léon ↗Chefneux (1853–1927). With him S. took part in the early stages of the Compagnie impériale des chemins de fer éthiopiens (↗Railways) by having the track built between ↗Djibouti and ↗Dərre Dawa. Shortly after, he created his own company (Compagnie Franco-africaine), became the director of Moulins d'Addis Abéba and of the plantation of Awra Mälka, on the banks of the ↗Awaš River.

S. carried out several official and unofficial missions between the French and Ethiopian governments (↗France, relations with). In 1889, he delivered a letter from aṣe ↗Mənilək II to the president of the French Republic, Sadi Carnot. S. was convinced that Mənilək, with whom he had a close relationship, could be a good partner for France. Mənilək invited him regularly to his ↗gəbbi and he acted in Ethiopia as a French foreign trade advisor.

S. lived in Ethiopia with a local woman, with whom he had a son. A prominent descendant of this relationship was the writer and politician Ahadu Sabure from Dərre Dawa (b. 1925), who was nominated Minister of Information in 1974. He was, however, forced by aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I to resign after only two months, as he was actively campaigning for a free press in the foremath of the ↗Revolution. Ahadu also served as ambassador of Ethiopia.

S. returned to France in 1894 and married Noémie Le Baron (1864–1934), one of his cousins. The couple lived in Addis Abäba and had two daughters who married Léon Chefneux's two sons. S. had a business partnership with his brother-in-law, Jules-Georges Le Baron (1872–1938), who was well known in Ethiopia in the 1930s as the most senior member of the French colony and a close advisor of Ḫaylä Śəllase. In 1927, S. went back to France and settled in Grasse.

S. wrote several reports on Ethiopia, today kept at the Archives of the French Ministère des Affaires étrangères. He also authored some articles in contemporary newspapers and a book on Ethiopian agriculture (1912).

Šäwarägga Mənilək

Wäyzäro Š.M. (ሸዋረጋ ፡ ምኒልክ; b. ca. 1860, d. December 1897, Däse [?]) is known in Ethiopian history as the daughter of aṣe ↗Mənilək II and the mother of ləǧ ↗Iyasu.

Large parts of Š.M.'s story remain uncertain. Her origins, in particular, were already questioned during Mənilək's time. ↗Gäbrä Śəllase made mention of her existence suddenly in the chronicle of Mənilək II, whilst she was already a young woman. It seems that she was recognized as a daughter of the Emperor only at an advanced age (cp. also Bairu Tafla 1972: 15). Hugues ↗Le Roux, a French journalist who visited Mənilək's court at the end of the 1890s, gives the following information about her background: her mother was a servant of Mənilək II, chased from the court out of jealousy whilst she was pregnant. Š.M. then grew up anonymously as an orphan until, thanks to her talisman, she was recognized at the age of 18 by a monk who took her to the court of her father (Le Roux 1914: 54–61.) Although the historicity of his story is doubtful, nevertheless her late legal recognition by Mənilək II as an illegitimate child might have been used by the Emperor to increase his chances of having a male offspring and to settle the problem of his succession (Bairu Tafla 1972: 14f.).

Š.M. was married in the 1880s to däǧǧazmač ↗Wädaǧǧo Gobäna. They had a son in 1885, Wäsän Sägäd, but then divorced for unknown reasons. Š.M. was remarried by her father in 1892 to ras ↗Mikaᵓel ᶜAli, as a reward for his military help against the rebel ras Zäwde. The marriage had strategic advantages for both sides: Mikaᵓel gained in prestige by entering the family of the Emperor, whilst Mənilək II was able to reinforce the fidelity of the powerful chief of Wällo (Bairu Tafla 1972: 15). Two children were born from their union, Zännäbä Wärq and then Iyasu in 1897, six months before the death of Š.M (GebMolIyas 558).

Mənilək II gave political offices to his three grandchildren, who grew up at his court. Wäsän Sägäd was the first to be chosen as heir-to-the-throne, but he suffered from dwarfism and died of tuberculosis in 1908. At the age of ten, Zännäbä Wärq was married to ras ↗Bäzzabbəh Täklä Haymanot, son of nəguś ↗Täklä Haymanot, but died around 1903, perhaps in childbed. Iyasu was nominated heir-to-the-throne in 1909. The uncertainty surrounding the origins of his mother may then have been one of the arguments used by his opponents against his royal descent (Prouty 1986: 357).

The life of Š.M. is an example of the political role given to women and children and reveal the complexity of the connection between public and private life during Mənilək's time.

Säyfä Śəllase Yoḥannəs

Mäggabe bəluy S. (ሰይፈ ፡ ሥላሴ ፡ ዮሐንስ; b. 1942/43, Dogäm Iyäsus, East Goğğam, d. 7 August 2010, Addis Abäba) was one of the most learned and prolific writers of the ↗Ethiopian Orthodox (Täwaḥədo) Church (EOTC) in the 20th cent.

Son of ato Yoḥannəs Räsᵓa and wäyzäro Ǝskäzziyaw Kasa, S. completed all levels of traditional church ↗education (↗nəbab bet, ↗mäṣḥaf bet, ↗zema bet, ↗aqqʷaqʷam, O.T. commentary tradition and ↗qəne bet) as a young man. In 1974/75, he attended theological courses in Preston Trinity College (UK) where he also studied Hebrew and Greek. He studied journalism in Kitwe (Zambia) in 1980.

From 1961 to 1965, S. taught ↗qəne in Qäčäne Däbrä Sälam Mädḫane ᶜAläm church. He was subsequently appointed in the Evangelization and Missionary Department (ሐዋርያዊ ፡ ድርጅት, Ḥawaryawi dərəğğət) as editor of its periodical publications including the journal ትንሣኤ (Tənśaᵓe) and the newspaper ድምፀ ፡ ተዋሕዶ ፡ ጋዜጣ (Dəmṣ́ä täwaḥədo gazeṭa). He was also teaching Gəᶜəz on the Bəsratä Wängel Radio Station. From 1981 to 1993, S. worked for the ↗Theological College of St. Paul, being at different times teacher, director and board member. For his contribution to the preparation of the college's O.T. manual, on 21 February 1985 he received the title mäggabe bəluy from the then patriarch abunä ↗Täklä Haymanot. In 1994, S. taught at the ↗Holy Trinity Theological College.

From 1995 to 2010 S. worked for the Liqawənt gubaᵓe ('Scholars' Council', cp. ↗Liq) in the Patriarchate, covering an array of posts: editor, translator and author. From May 2009 until his death in August 2010, S. was the chairperson of the Council. During this period, he represented the EOTC at a number of conferences of the World Council of Churches and the All Africa Conference of Churches. He was also a board member and the chair of the translation team in the Bible Society of Ethiopia (2005–10); member of general assembly (and head of Gəᶜəz and literature committee) in the Ethiopian Languages and Cultures Academy at ↗Addis Abäba University (2009–10). He was a delegate to two EOTC synods.

S. authored a number of works published under the auspices of the EOTC, most of which of high scholarly value. He was a co-author of the Amharic Bible Dictionary (1979) and a series of programmatic brochures (1986; 1990). His research was mainly dedicated to the qəne tradition (e.g., 2002; Admasu Ğämbäre 1998/99; tr. of qəne in Märsəᵓe Ḥazän Wäldä Qirqos 2009/10: 419–25) and the biblical interpretation (a series of articles in the Ethiopian Review of Cultures vols. 4–5, 12–13; also in abunä Gärima et al. 2007/08). An issue of the Ethiopian Review of Cultures (vol. 14, 2011) was dedicated to his memory.

S. was buried with great honours at the cemetery of the ↗Qəddəst Śəllase Cathedral.

Schleicher, Adolph Walther

S. (also Adolf Walter S., b. 31 May 1854, in Antwerp, Belgium, d. 2 May 1894, Tanga, today Tanzania) was a trained engineer who became a linguist working primarily on North-east-African languages, notably ↗Somali.

S.’s interest in African languages and linguistics developed after a journey to Egypt in 1887. He enrolled at the Orientalisches Seminar in Berlin in 1889 and continued his studies in Vienna under Leo ↗Reinisch who became his friend and mentor. In the early 1890s S. wrote his Ph.D. thesis and subsequently published a small number of linguistic monographs, among which were an essay (in many ways debatable) in comparative linguistics (1891), a grammatical sketch of Somali with a commendable collection of texts (1892), and a notable first edition of ↗Baḥrəy’s history of the ↗Oromo (1893, s. also ↗Zenahu lägalla). In early 1894 he travelled via Massawa to the Swedish mission at ↗Əmkullu, where he compiled data on oral literature. They were later used by ↗Paulitschke for the second volume of his Ethnographie Nordost-Afrikas. S. then wanted to proceed to Zanzibar, but fell critically ill, and died shortly after arriving at the port city of Tanga, then German East Africa.

In his short scholarly life S. established a basis for fundamental linguistic research in Somali and thereby motivated successive scholars to further work in this linguistic area (such as Leo Reinisch, Kurt Berghold, or John William Carnegie Kirk).

Səbḥat Gäbrä Ǝgziʾabəḥer

S. (ስብሐት [or ስብሐት ፡ ለአብ, Səbḥat Läʾab]: ገብረ ፡ እግዚአብሔር; b. 5 May 1936, Ruba [also Rəba] Gäräd, Təgray, d. 20 February 2012, Addis Abäba) was a prominent 20th-cent. journalist and author.

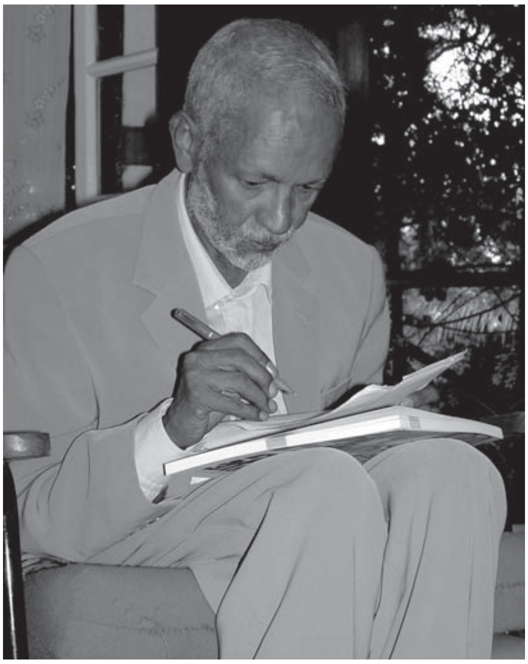
S.'s parents were qes Gäbrä Ǝgziʾabəḥer Yoḥannəs, an Orthodox priest and farmer, and Mäᶜaza Täwäldä Mädḫən, daughter of the Protestant convert aläqa Täwäldä Mädḫən Gäbru. He started his education in church school under his father in 1945, in 1946 he became a boarding student at the Swedish Evangelical Mission school in Addis Abäba (directed by Sven Rubenson). He completed his secondary education in the Täfäri Mäkʷännən Secondary School. He subsequently enrolled at the University College (now ↗Addis Ababa University), getting trained as English teacher. In college, he became interested in world literature, first English (Stevenson, Maugham) but also Russian (Chekhov, Dostoevsky) and French (Maupassant, Proust, Zola, while the latter particularly influenced S.'s "naturalistic" view of man). While less interested in ↗Amharic literature, he did later acknowledge ↗Daññačč̣äw Wärqu as his mentor and one of the strongest influences, responsible also for his choice of writing in Amharic.

On graduation in 1958, S. taught for some months at Asfa Wäsän School and then worked in the scholarship department of the Ministry of Education. In 1960, he was sent to study library science in Washington, DC. In 1961, he resumed teaching in Ethiopia, and in 1962, with the help of Claude Sumner, then professor of philosophy at Addis Ababa University, S. got a UNESCO scholarship to go to Aix-en-Provence in France to study philosophy and sociology. S. dropped his studies after two weeks, but kept his scholarship, and used his two-year stay to complete his first novel, Letum aynägalləññ. As it described the life in the red-light district of Addis Abäba in colourful details, and was considered vulgar and obscene by many, it could not be published until many years later (2004; French tr. 2004).

After his return from France in 1965, S. worked for a year in the Ministry of Education. From 1966 to 1968, he was an assistant editor of the ↗Mänän magazine under ↗Bäᶜalu Gərma. During that period, S. wrote many articles as well as completed his second novel, Təkkusat, about an Iranian revolutionary who finds solace in sex (publ. 1997).

Next, S., together with Däräǧǧä Däressa, started a public relations firm, where S. took care of the firm's two publications, ↗Ethiopia Mirror (a quarterly) and the Amharic edition of Mänän (a monthly) for over six years, until the firm was closed down by the Därg in 1974 (↗Provisional Military Administrative Council). During his time in this firm, he married Hanna Yəlma, daughter of the Minister of Finance ↗Yəlma Däressa, by whom he had a son, Iyasu. Hanna and the child left Ethiopia following the Revolution of 1974. S. later had four more children by two other women.

S. continued writing short stories that could not be published for their explicit sexual content (↗Sexuality). His next job was to write a story every month for Qum nägär, a publication started by the actor Däbbäbä Ǝšätu. But due to interference from the censors, he resigned, and remained unemployed for almost a year, until he got a job with the Ministry of Information (1976/77–78/79). At this time, S. became close to Bäᶜalu Gərma, who depicted S. in his novel Därasiw ('The author', publ. 1979/80). S. next worked for a year for the Ethiopia Book Cen-



Səbḥat Gäbrä Ǝgziʾabəḥer; photo 2004, courtesy of Francis Falceto tre, a private publisher and distributor, and then joined the Tourism Commission, in charge of their publications. Then he was "selected" as one of a team to translate Karl Marx's Das Kapital, although he called himself an individualist without interest in ideologies or politics. From 1984 until 1991, S. was the chief editor of the Kurraz Publishing Agency. He was a regular contributor to the monthly Yäkkatit.

After the fall of the Därg regime, S. started to work for the ↗Bərhanənna Sälam Printing Press. He first became a columnist for the governmental ↗Addis Zämän daily. He was then the columnist for the Addis Admas private-run weekly newspaper and editor for The ↗Ethiopian Herald. During the last year of his life, S. also tried himself in a completely new role, starring in a film comedy Mäfänqlä setoč̣č̣ ('Uprising of Women') by Mikaᵓel Ləᶜulsägäd (2011).

S., often addressed with the epithet gaš ('my beloved'), was both a popular and controversial writer due to his favourite theme (both in life and literature) of sex and his bohemian lifestyle. His funeral at the cemetery of the ↗Qəddəst Śəllase cathedral was reportedly attended by two to three thousand people.

S.'s younger brother Täwäldä Bərhan Gäbrä Ǝgziᵓabəḥer (b. 1940) is a prominent environmentalist and scientist, winner of the Right Livelihood and Champions of the Earth awards.

Səddät: Mäṣḥafä səddät

M.s. (መጽሐፈ ፡ ስደት, 'The Book of the persecution', also Mäṣḥafä səddätomu) is the phrase used in an incipit introducing in some manuscripts (e.g., Oxford, Bodleian Library, Bruce 88) a section of an account of the conquest of ↗Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ġāzī (Grañ). Kropp (s. KrLebD 12 [text] = 12 [tr.]) used the phrase as the title of the account.

Several moderately different versions of the M.s. exist (e.g., mss. BN Éth. 104, 106 in ZotBNat 212f., 215f., cp. Conti Rossini 1893: 671, n. 2). However, for reasons of style and composition, it can be treated as a distinct literary work. Thus, in ms. Bruce 88 (DillBodl 78ff., no. 29) it is not only clearly separated from the rest of the text, but also has its own introduction (where the phrase "M.s." appears). Kropp (KrLebD IX–XXIII [text]) lists 37 manuscripts that contain the M.s.

The M.s. covers the years 1529–43, i.e. the second half of aṣe ↗Ləbnä Dəngəl's reign and the early years of his son and successor aṣe ↗Gälawdewos's reign. It describes largely the same events as the Arabic chronicle of Grañ's contest, the ↗Futūḥ al-Ḥabaša (s. BassHist), and was probably used for the passages in the "short chronicles" devoted to this period (s. BassÉt I, 327–34 [text]; BegCron 27–34; Perruchon 1893: 274–86, 1894: 155–66, 263–70; DombrChr 38–47 [text]). Since the climax of the work is the arrival of the Portuguese under Christovão da ↗Gama and the death of Grañ, it can clearly be seen as the account of the latter's invasion and not as a "chronicle" of the Ethiopian emperors. The author of the M.s. witnessed many of the events he relates, or at least relied on eye-witnesses. His writing style may suggest that he was a cleric at the royal court (KrLebD XXIVf. [tr.]). He was likely an Amhara, as he makes several disparaging remarks concerning Təgrayan lords (KrLebD 19 [text] = 18f. [tr.]; Conti Rossini 1894: 618).

The account of the M.s. is much more condensed than that of the Futūḥ al-Ḥabaša; it is also obviously Church-centred, as it provides significant detail on the destruction of churches by Grañ's army. Frequently, the exact date and names of the destroyed sites are given, e.g., ↗Däbrä Ḥayq Ǝsṭifanos on 7 December 1531 (KrLebD 13 [text]). Mention is also made of battles between the two parties, as well as of the Christian military leaders killed in action, e.g., ras ↗Ǝslam Sägäd or ras ↗Wäsän Sägäd (KrLebD 13 [text]). Some of the details in the M.s. are unique when compared to other chronicles, such as the date of the death (5 April 1536) of ↗Ǝslam Däḥar (KrLebD 15 [text]; cp. BassHist II, 242).

The records from the M.s. and the contemporary report of Miguel de ↗Castanhoso, however, not infrequently contradict each other, especially concerning dates and place names.

Ṣəlalo

Ṣ. (ጽላሎ, also Däbrä or Gong Ṣ., in Jesuit sources Çalalô, Seladó, Zalalo; 11° 11' 29" N, 37° 42' 40" E) is an area in Yəlmanna Densa wäräda in western ↗Goǧǧam, prominent for the monastery of Ṣ. Amanuʾel. It lies half way between Moṭa and Adet and about 20 km from the River ↗Abbay. Nearby there is the mountain and monastery of Qʷat and its lands are crossed by the River Abäya, a tributary of the Abbay.

One of the earliest references to the church is that by Nəwayä Maryam, a monk from Ṣ. who on 2 June 1038 or 1114 headed to the Holy Places (cp. EAE 2, 243).

During the early modern period, the area and monastery of Ṣ. were frequently the scene of important historical episodes. Towards 10 August 1563 the young ↗Śärṣ̌ä Dəngəl and his brother Fiqṭor, fleeing the persecution of Ḥarbo, took refuge at Ṣ. The brothers stayed there for three weeks hosted by the abbot ᶜƎfrätä Giyorgis (CRHist 13f.).

Some time after the 16th or 17th cent., Ṣ. seems to have been included in the "northern" monastic network. A church called Ṣəᶜəlalo appears among the fiefs of ↗Aksum Ṣəyon in one of the documents of Mäṣḥafä Aksum (ascribed to ↗Abrəha and Aṣbəḥa, CRAxum doc. II, 1; also BruNile III, 417). A certain abba Peṭros of Ṣ. appears in several monastic genealogies among the followers of ↗Absadi, a disciple of ↗Ewosṭatewos (s. Lusini 2004: 264, 267, 270).

In ca. 1607, aṣe ↗Yaᶜəqob sojourned with his army at Ṣ., shortly before he was killed by the army of ↗Susənyos in the battle of Qol near the River Yəbärt (PerChron 66f.). Later, Susənyos himself visited the area of Ṣ. on several occasions (e.g., BecRASO III, 344, 350; PerChron 81).

According to ↗Jesuit sources (not supported by any indigenous source), Ṣ. was one of the Goǧǧam monasteries that embraced ↗Catholicism. The monastery was supervised from the nearby Jesuit residence of ↗Qʷälläla and a number of its monks were active supporters of Catholicism (BecRASO IV, 15). Such was the case with abba Zäʾamanuʾel, abba Abalä Krəstos (Cohen 2009: 64; BecRASO IX, 445) and abba Zäśəllase. The latter was killed by the rebel ↗Śärṣ̌ä Krəstos on 24 May 1631 for refusing to profess the Alexandrian faith (BecRASO XII, 485, 492ff.; VII, 112). Reportedly, during this period the monastery possessed extensive estates. In 1647, one abba Abalä Krəstos from Ṣ. was part of a small Catholic group of priests and faithful who took refuge in ↗Ṭaqussa (BecRASO XIII, 286). In ca. 1648 the death of one Ləbsä Krəstos, abbot of Ṣ., is recorded (BegCron 50f.).

In 1688, the abbot of Ṣ. Näbiyä Wängel was present at the religious council of ↗Yəbaba convened by ↗Iyasu I (GuiIohan 124 [tr.]). Later, during the reign of ↗Iyasu II the abbot of Ṣ. was one Tewodros, an influential figure in the kingdom. He was made ↗ṣäḥafe təʾəzaz and was one of those in charge of bringing a metropolitan from Egypt after the death of abunä ↗Krəstodolu III (GuiIyas 126–30).

Towards February 1770, a large area extending from Ṣ. to Qʷälläla was raided by ras ↗Mikaʾel Səḥul (BlunChr 6 [text] = 211 [tr.]). Later, towards July 1789, nəguś ↗Täklä Giyorgis camped there (BlunChr 185, 467).

The monastery of Ṣ. has a renowned religious ↗qəne school which is one of the three qəne centres in the country with its own distinct tradition. *Qəne*s which are composed according to the school's model are difficult to understand for the principles taught there prompt the author to use complicated concepts and images.

The church school was founded by Ṣadəqu Yoḥannəs, according to tradition a son of aṣe ↗Fasilädäs (Ḥamär 1994:23). The founder of the qəne school was Täwanäy who was originally from Däbrä Ṭəbäb in Goǧǧam. The reason for the establishment of Ṣ. and other qəne centres may have been the war of ↗Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ġāzī (Admasu Ǧämbäre 1970/71:9–13; Academy of Ethiopian Languages 1980:20). Breaking communications between scholars, it disrupted the tradition of consultation in order to standardize qəne knowledge.

The famous qəne teacher əmmahoy ↗Gälanäš Ḥaddis was born in Ṣ., where she also taught for over 50 years. The current qəne master of Ṣ. is liqä liqawənt Yared Šəfärraw, a famous traditional scholar on qəne from the same area.

Sinai

S. (Hebr. יניס, Sînay, Gr. Σινά, Siná, Ar. سيناء, Sīnāʾ, Eth. ሲና, Sinā) is a triangular peninsula in ↗Egypt, to the north of the ↗Red Sea, between the gulfs of Suez and ᶜAqaba. It forms a plateau with several high peaks and a few fertile valleys such as Pharán (modern Firān) and Rhaïthoû (aṭ-Ṭūr or Abū Zanīma) – in Late Antiquity, the seats of important urban and monastic settlement respectively.

Because of its strategic geopolitical position as a land bridge connecting Africa and Asia, this region has been disputed throughout the centuries. In medieval and modern times it was ruled by the subsequent governments of Egypt – Ayyubids, Mamluks and the dynasty of ↗Muḥammad ᶜAlī (s. EAE vol. 5) – and then controlled, like the rest of the country, by the ↗Ottoman Empire. It was later occupied by the ↗United Kingdom (1882–1956) and eventually became part of the Arab Republic of Egypt. Invaded by Israel during the Suez crisis (1956) and again during the Six Day War (1967), it was finally returned to Egypt in 1982, after the Israel–Egypt Peace Treaty of 1979. Across the different ages and circumstances, owing to the patronage of the Byzantine and then the Russian emperors, it remained an important symbol of Orthodoxy (s. Piatnisky et al. 2000).

Mentioned several times in the ↗Bible, both in the O.T. and in the N.T., the S.-complex is one of the most significant religious places for the Abrahamic faiths, the elevations of its southern massif being an early object of veneration: one of them, Mount S. (Ar. Ṭūr Sīnāʾ or Ǧabal Mūsā), was first identified by ↗Eusebius of Caesarea, in the 4th cent. A.D., as the actual place where Israel entered into a covenant with God after the Egyptian bondage. There, ↗Moses would have received from God the Law for his people before continuing on the wilderness journey (Ex 18–40; Lev 25:1–7, 7:38; Num 1–10; 33–49; and esp. Deut 1:6–18, 4:9–14, 5:2–31, 9:8–11) – a subject well represented in Byzantine (Aliprantis 1991) as well as in Ethiopian illuminations (s. ↗Octateuch).

Three biblical passages stage S., more generally, as the place where God "dwells" or whence "he comes" (Deut 33:2, Jud 5:5, Ps 68:9 and 18). Elsewhere in the Bible (Deut 1–28; Ex 3:1, 17:6, 33:6; 1 Kgs 8:9, 19:8; 2 Chr 5:10; Ps 106:9; Mal 3:22), the name Horeb seems to be used for S. (but s. Davies 1979: 68f.). According to St. Paul, S. is "foreshadowed by Agar", the slave, as the "Jewish Jerusalem" vs. the "heavenly Jerusalem", symbol of Christian freedom (Gal 4:24f.). In the extensive Christian pseudepigraphical literature about Moses, his encounter with God is frequently featured: in particular, in a medieval writing known as the Colloquy of the Prophet Moses with God, extant in Syriac, Arabic and Gəʿəz (↗Motä Muse), itself a translation from Arabic (Zuurmond in StudAeth, detailing the fortunes of the text in the ↗Betä Ǝsraʾel tradition).

The identification enforced by Eusebius is clearly attested, between 381 and 384, in the travel book of the pilgrim Egeria (Peregr. 1, 2–2, 7, ed. Maraval 1982: 120–29; cp. Peregr. 4, 6–5, 10, ibid. 140–49). By then, Christian hermits had already settled in S., with several cells near the shrine of the Bátos, or "Burning bush", ordered to be built by St. Helena, the mother of Emperor Constantine, at the mouth of a gorge on the slopes of Mount S. This was considered to be the memorial of the theophany of Moses (Ex. 3:1–6; cp. Ac 7:30 and 38). It was here, on the "God-trodden" mountain, that Emperor ↗Justinian I, between 548 and 550/51 or 565/66, built a fortified monastery both for the shelter of the monks from Bedouin raids, which often ended in martyrdom, and for the defence of Palestine, in association with the (too far-away) Roman garrison at Klysma (Qulzum, Suez; s. Davies 1979: 30ff., and Pierre-Beylot 2011: 70–75).

Continuously occupied ever since, the monastery with its basilica was first dedicated to the Theotókos ('Mother of God'), the Bátos being treated as early as the 4th cent. as a "type" of the Virgin. It was only in the 10th or 11th cent. that the monastery was named after St. Catherine, when the remains of the Alexandrian martyr were miraculously shifted thereto from a chapel on a nearby peak. As a result of the Islamic conquest, the bishop of Pharán moved his seat to the monastery, but by the end of the 7th cent. the area fell to the Arabs, too (s. Pierre-Beylot 2011: 102–13).

Along with its many dependencies (metóchia) in the S. peninsula as well as in Cyprus and Crete (on the latter's artistic relations with S., s. Vassilaki 2009: 741ff. and n. 2), Saint Catherine's monastery forms the Orthodox Church of Mount Sinai, headed by an archbishop, i.e. the abbot of the monastery, who is consecrated by the Orthodox patriarch of ↗Jerusalem and, since a few centuries, has been usually residing in Cairo and more or less independent from that patriarch.

The monastery has preserved much of its 6th-cent. original features, including the outer walls and the basilica with the apse mosaic of the Transfiguration (the local patron feast) and the fine wood carvings on the entrance door and the ceiling beams (Guiglia Guidobaldi 1998: 691ff.). Thanks to its remote location, the place was untouched by Byzantine iconoclasm, and never sacked. It still houses a unique collection of over 2,000 icons, with extremely rare examples of the 6th and 7th cent. (Nelson – Collins 2006; Gerstel – Nelson 2011), and a library of some 7,000 old prints and more than 3,300 papyrus (s. EAE vol. 5), parchment and paper ↗manuscripts from the Late Antiquity to the Modern Age (Kamil 1970; Meimaris 1985; Hierà Monì kè Archiepiskopì Sinâ 1998): the famous 4th-cent. Codex Sinaiticus (S) of the Greek N.T., now divided between the British Library, the Leipzig University Library, Saint Catherine's Monastery and the National Library of Russia, was part of it until 1859. Some 1,200 manuscripts were discovered as recently as in 1975 within the northern walls of the monastery.

Saint Catherine's manuscripts are written in a number of languages, which reflects the variety of people who have lived in S. or passed thereby: Greek (two thirds of the collection), Latin, Hebrew, Arabic, Armenian, Georgian, old Udi (Caucasian), Syriac and Gəʿəz (for the latter, s. Kamil 1957 and 1970: 55, with one 14th- and two 15th-cent. exemplars: no. 6, ↗Psalter [Dawit] and Odes. Hōrológion. ↗Wəddase Maryam, and, resp., no. 4, Prayers, Song of Songs, Psalter [1429 A.D.], and no. 5, Psalms with Kathísmata and Hōrológion; a 13th-cent. Greek palimpsest on Ethiopic script – for which it would suggest a remarkable antiquity – is reported in Hierà Monì kè Archiepiskopì Sinâ 1998: 88 and 172: ms. M 90, Hōrólogion).

S. soon became a centre of Melkite culture, witnessing the activity of such authors as John Climacus, abbot of Rhaïthoû, and Anastasius of Sinai in the 7th cent. The deeds of the S. monks were recorded in several collections (e.g., by Nilus of Ancyra and Ammonius, s. Pierre-Beylot 2011: 76–93). The place of composition of the Greek Martyrdom of ↗Arethas (s. ↗Nağrān) is also likely to be located at S. (Fiaccadori 2010): a text for which an Ethiopic version quite different from the well-known Acts of Ḫirut, and more faithful to the Greek original, has now come to light (Bausi 2010a: 249ff.). This might also point to direct connections, in terms of literary relationships, between Ethiopia and Sinai – on the way to Jerusalem – in late Aksumite times (↗Aksum), as is more clearly the case for the major work of Climacus, the Heavenly Ladder (ca. 650 A.D.). Only the 5th section of this treatise is found, translated into Ethiopic from Greek (most likely at S. itself rather than in Aksum, where the knowledge of this language was already fading by the age of nəguś ↗Kaleb, s. ↗Monumentum Adulitanum), in the 14th/15th-cent. ms. EMML no. 1939, fols 102ra–13vb (Beylot 2009: 91–107, cp. Bausi 2010b: 242f. and Fiaccadori 2012, 277f.). A similar connection, next to those with Egypt and the Holy Land, cannot be excluded for the transmission, in later times, of Arabic (Melkite) texts to Ethiopic literature. Likewise, a bilingual (Greek and Arabic) milieu, to be most probably sought in the 8th/9th-cent. Melkite communities of S. or Palestine under Islamic rule might well account for the "Arabian" part of the Life of ↗Gregentios (Fiaccadori 2007: 80 and n. 205).

Ties of Ethiopia and S. might have entailed the Melkite interest in the country that, from the 10th cent. at least, occasionally surfaces in Arabic and Ethiopic sources: as late as 1622 a Melkite monk from S. succeeded in being appointed as "metropolitan of ↗Təgray" (Conti Rossini 1940: 75f. and n. 1). Such ties might well vindicate, however, the presence of new visual patterns, Byzantine in style, appearing, as recently pointed out (Heldman 2007: 101–05), in late 14th-cent. Ethiopian illuminated manuscript: e.g., those produced in the so-called scriptorium of nəguś ↗Dawit II, with an impact of contemporary – 13th- and 14th-cent. – Palaiologan models. The same relay might also apply, for the subsequent Ethiopian painting (with Nicolò ↗Brancaleone and his "Italianate school"), to later Cretan icon-production, so massively represented at S. (cp. Vassilaki 2009: 743 and nn. 5–6).

S., the position of which in relation to Alexandria and Cairo should also be emphasized, was a much longed for goal, mainly as an extension to traditional pilgrimages to ↗Jerusalem and the Holy Land, with which it had a special link, as with the acknowledged source of Orthodoxy.

Rock ↗inscriptions and graffiti, also in a number of languages, were scattered by pilgrims and visitors throughout the peninsula along most of the itineraries leading to Ǧabal Mūsā – esp. in the Wādi Ḥaǧǧāǧ, on the Ḍarb al-arbaᶜīn ('Forty days road'), the age-old route to ᶜAyla that crosses the Eastern S. (s. Stone 1982, 1992 and 1994). Here a vocalized inscription in Gəᶜəz was found incised on "rock 3" (Puech 1980, ignored in Stone 1992, vol. 2, 158, no. 5129: "unidentified inscription"). The short text has been dated by its editor to the 6th/7th cent. A.D. (Puech 1980). Left by a certain Agaton, "servant of Christ" (gäbrä Krəstos), i.e. a monk, from "Däbrä Manzo", it could be much less ancient, as this toponym points to the Lake ↗Ṭana region (cp. Bet Manzo, Ǝgr Manzo, Čeqla Manzo), where Christian communities seem not to be attested prior to the 11th/12th cent. (Fiaccadori in preparation).

The inscription confirms the traditional ties of Ethiopia with S., as reflected also in the name of the island of ↗Däbrä Sina in Lake ↗Zʷay and of the monasteries of ↗Däbrä Sina in Sänḥit (Eritrea, also called Däbrä Sihat, after the Egyptian desert of Scetis), said to have been founded by abunä ↗Yoḥanni who came from Egypt under aṣe ↗Gäbrä Mäsqäl I, and of ↗Däbrä Sina on the shores of Lake Ṭana (near ↗Gorgora), established by abunä Tomas under aṣe ↗ᶜAmdä Ṣəyon I, as well as of the more ancient church now usually called Betä Mikaᵓel, but formerly known as (Betä) Däbrä Sina, interconnected with Betä Golgota – and mirroring thereby S.'s link with Jerusalem – in the "northern complex" at ↗Lalibäla.

Sinoda

Abba S. (ሲኖዳ; fl. first half 15th cent.) was the founder of Däbrä Ṣəmmuna (BassÉt I, 352; PerChron 16), a monastery located in eastern ↗Goǧǧam, close to ↗Däbrä Wärq (Conti Rossini 1894: 47; TadTChurch 202).

The only source on S.'s life is his Vita (↗gädl; attested in an uncatalogued manuscript in ↗Dima Giyorgis, fols. 1–25), which is still unpublished.

In the 20th-cent. manuscript EMML no. 1601, S.'s gädl is mentioned in a list of 652 books as part of a group of "Acts of Ethiopian Saints" (fols. 14r–16r). The manuscript was allegedly written by a certain däbtära, probably liqä ṭäbbäbt Aklilä Bərhan Wäldä Qirqos, who seems to have visited remote churches and monasteries. It is, however, uncertain if he really read S.'s Vita – as with the other books listed – or if he simply copied the list found in the margins of some manuscripts (cp. EMML V, 81–87).

According to the manuscript of Dima Giyorgis (TadTChurch 202, n. 2, 303), S. was born in ↗Wäǧ, in Šäwa, and received traditional education at a monastery on Lake ↗Zʷay, where he was later ordained monk. Traditions collected in Däbrä Wärq associate S. with Ǝndrəyas, a disciple of ↗Gäbrä Iyäsus of ↗Däbrä San. However, S.'s Vita contains no references to Däbrä San: it only states that S. was a disciple of Ǝndrəyas of Zʷay (fol. 3r; TadTChurch 217, n. 1).

S. moved to Goǧǧam during the reign of aṣe ↗Yəsḥaq, where he established Däbrä Ṣəmmuna. Later on, during the reign of Ḥəzbä Nañ (↗Täklä Maryam), he was involved in the conflict of succession between Ḥəzbä Nañ and his younger brother aṣe ↗Zärʾa Yäʿəqob: S. was accused by the king of being a supporter of Zärʾa Yäʿəqob and to favour the latter's accession to the throne. S. was consequently exiled to the island of ↗Däq in Lake ↗Ṭana where he died after being tortured and having his hands and feet amputated (ms. Dima Giyorgis, fols. 20–21; TadTChurch 202, n. 4, 278f.; Taddesse Tamrat in PICES 4, 514f.).

Smith, Arthur Donaldson

S. (b. 27 April 1866, Andalusia, PA, d. 16 February 1936, Philadelphia, PA) was an American physician, big game hunter (↗Hunting) and explorer. In 1895 he headed a self-sponsored expedition to reach Lake ↗Turkana (then Lake Rudolf). This expedition was the first to access the lake from a northern (Ethiopian) direction. Previous expeditions like those of Count Teleki and ↗Höhnel approached the lake from the southern (Kenyan) side.

Arthur Donaldson Smith; from Smith, 1897: frontispiece

S. was born into a wealthy American family of German descent. In 1881 he enrolled at the University of Pennsylvania and later studied chemistry at Johns Hopkins University. In 1889 he graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in medical studies. After this, he undertook postgraduate studies at the University of Heidelberg in Germany. He practised as a surgeon in Pennsylvania until the death of his father, after which he began using the wealth inherited to follow international hunting trips (cp. Imperato 1998: 104ff.).

S.'s first encounter with Africa was through an invitation to a hunting trip to ↗British Somaliland with William Lord Smith (Smith 1897: 1ff.). S. used this trip to evaluate the pre-conditions for an expedition into the Northeast African interior "to pass through the country laying between Somaliland and Lake Rudolf" (Smith 1897: 2). Eventually, in 1884, this expedition took him from ↗Zaylaᶜ to ↗Berbera and then inland via ↗Hargeisa, crossing the ↗Wabi Šäbälle, through ↗Bale across ↗Šayḫ Ḥusayn towards the ↗Omo River. The Royal Geographical Society supported his journey with some instruments for scientific purposes, and S. hired the British taxidermist Edward Dodson to gather specimens on the way.

S.'s journey was blocked by the men of däǧǧazmač ↗Wäldä Gäbrəᵓel at Šayḫ Ḥusayn, whom S. then visited in his residence in ↗Ginnir to negotiate a trespass through Abyssinian controlled territory (for a description of the court of the däǧǧazmač s. Smith 1897, ch. 5). Waiting for consultation of his case and a letter of aṣe ↗Mənilək II he visited and described the caves of ↗Soof Omar, which he named "Caves of Wyndlawn" (Smith 1897: 88). Mənilək's letter was negatively misinterpreted by Wäldä Gäbrəᵓel, and S. was ordered to go back. In reality, Mənilək only advised S. to postpone his travels, since the Emperor was about to go on an expedition to the Turkana region and feared S. would get between the lines of fire (the letter is reprinted in Smith 1897: 103). S. thus changed his initial route, went back and took a passage further south through ↗Boorana lands.

S.'s account is a vivid one, sometimes the ethnographic relevance is blurred with misinterpretations (e.g., about the pygmy "Dume") and adventure and hunting scenes. Nonetheless, his travel report offers interesting insights into the politics of the expanding Ethiopian empire and the peoples he encountered, such as the Boorana and ↗Arbore.

One of the endeavours of S.'s journey was to clarify the question whether the Omo fed the Turkana Lake which was not resolved even on S.'s second journey from Turkana to the Nile valley in 1900 (for S.'s conclusions cp. also Imperato 1998: 117).

S.'s rich ethnographic, zoological and geological collection is preserved by the University of Pennsylvania Museum and the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia.

Today "Mount Smith" (Ğimša) is the only physical reminder of S.'s travels.

Soba Noba

S.N. (ሶባ ፡ ኖባ) is a composite assonant denomination created by Ethiopian popular tradition and interpreted with different meanings. It is attested: (1) in two passages of the ↗Kəbra nägäśt as a place-name (BezKebr 109 [text]) and as a toponym (Soba, the capital of the kingdom of ᶜAlwa, in Southern ↗Nubia) and an ethnonym (↗Noba) (BezKebr 127 [text]); (2) in two passages of the Ethiopic legend of the ↗Maccabees as a toponym (Horovitz 1905–06: 224 and 225); (3) in a 15th-cent. polemic writing, reported by Páez, where St. Mark is called "master of Nobâ and Sobâ and of Ethiopia" (BecRASO II, 49); (4) in Ethiopia's geographic description provided by Bermudez (16th cent.), where it is called "Çubia Nubia" and is located "to the west of Dämbəya" (Bermudez 1875: 114); (5) in the Gädlä ↗Yoḥanni of Däbrä ᶜAśa as a toponym, while hinting at Ethiopian expeditions against bəḥerä Noba wäsaba, 'the land of Noba and Saba', most plausibly Soba (Basset 1885: 443, s. Fiaccadori 1992: 17f. n. 52).

S.N. is also attested in a proverb widespread in the northern provinces of Təgray: "[time of] Qiyat Miyat elapsed; [time of] Soba Noba elapsed; [time of] Bäläw Käläw elapsed! Times are different now". According to some Təgrayan traditions, the proverb refers to the first groups that ruled over the country, before the Təgrayan people (Conti Rossini 1912: 365ff.).

Furthermore, S. and N. are known from an episode narrated in the late recension of Gädlä ↗Afṣe as two brothers of Sabaean origin who ruled over Ethiopia (a story somehow parallel to, or reminiscent of, that of ↗Abrəha and Aṣbəḥa). In the Year of the World 3510 (1990 B.C.), they built their residence in ↗Yəḥa: a big stone-wall tower covered with gold, silver and precious stones. Some time later, to efface the memory of the two brothers, the people of Kusa, sons of Kam, destroyed the tower (Schneider 1985: 109).

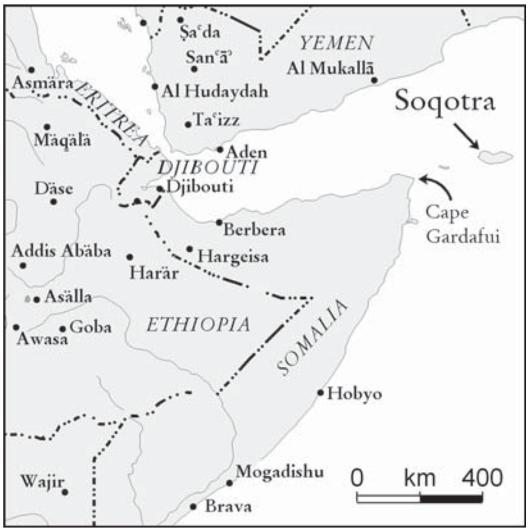
Soqotra

S. (also Socotra, Suquṭra, Suqaṭrāʾ, Suqūṭarāʾ, Usquṭrā; 12° 30' 36" N, 53° 55' 12" E) is a small archipelago of four islands in the Indian Ocean, today part of the Republic of ↗Yemen. The largest island, also called S., lies 230 km east of Cape ↗Gardafui and about 400 km south of the Arabian Peninsula. The three smaller islands are ᶜAbd al-Kūrī, Samha and Darsa. The larger island extends 133 km from east to west and 49 km from south to north and has a surface of 3,600 km². The highest elevations in the Hağeher mountains, in the centre of the island, reach 1,500 m A.S.L. The bulk of the population lives along the northern coast, within its capital Ḥadibū and a few cultivated areas. In 2004 the population of the island was 43,000, largely living from date harvesting, fishing and animal husbandry (Naumkin 1993; Guébourg 1998; Wranik 1999).

Due to its isolation, the island has developed a biodiversity unique in the Arabian Sea. Botanical field surveys indicate that 307 out of the 825 (37 %) plant species on S. are endemic. Its special fauna and flora were the source of products and essences that were highly valued in the past: dragon's blood (also called cinnabar), aloe, ↗zibeth, ambergris, incense and nacre (obtained from turtle carapaces; Simeone-Senelle 1994).

The natives of S. speak Suquṭri, one of the Modern South Arabian languages (Porkhomovsky 1995). The old name of the island in the local languages (Ḥaḍramī and Sabaic) could have been S³KRD, which is found in two 6th cent. A.D. inscriptions among the titles of the Yazʾanides (BR-Yanbuq 47/5–6 and CIH 621/5), a princely lineage of the ↗Ḥaḍramawt that dominated Ḥaḍramawt and Mahra (Müller 1884–91, col. 714; Robin 2012: 443–46).

Non-Arabic sources refer to S. as Dioskoridēs, thus not so dissimilar from S³KRD (↗Periplus of the Erythraean Sea §§ 30–31 [tr. Casson 1989]; Ptolemaeus VI, 7, 45, VIII, 22, 17 [Ptolemaeus 1843]; ↗Cosmas Indicopleustes [ed. Wolska-Conus 1973: 65]; Stephanus of Byzantium [ed. Meineke 1849: 233]; Pliny the Elder [tr. Rackham 1969: 153]; Ammianus Marcellinus [tr. Rolfe 1940]



XXIII, 6, 47). The name Dioskoridēs could be a hellenized form of S³KRD or *ḏ-S³KRD (modern places in S. are similarly preceeded by the prefix di), which would be further supported by local traditions reporting of two brothers recalling the story of the Dioskouroi. Similarly, in Arabic the dragon's blood is called "blood of the two brothers" (damm al-aḫawayn) and the two islands west of S., Samha and Darsa, are called the "Brothers" (alternatively also the "Sisters") (Hugh Scott et al. 1949: 609 and images 353–54). Such identification must have been helped by the fact that the apparition of the two twin stars, Castor and Pollux, was seen as a favourable omen for navigation. Another, less likely etymology, would derive the name from Sanskrit Dvipa sukhatara ('happy island'; cf. Tkatsch 1913–34: 497). Yet, there is no mention of such an island in Indian literature (Strauch 2012: 397–403).

The island might have also been known by other names in the past. In Agatharchides of Cnidus the S. archipelago is called "lucky islands" (nêsoi eudáimones; ed. Burstein 1989: 5, 105, 169). Some scholars have also identified S. with the mythological island of the phoenix, called A-a-penenka or Pa-anch ('island of the Genius') in Egyptian or Pancheia in Greek (cf. Tkatsch 1913–34: 498; Ziegler 1949). S. was also identified with the island of Dibous, the homeland of Theophilos the Indian (Philostorgius [ed. Bidez-Winkelmann 1972] III, 4–6). But this hypothesis is rendered difficult by the fact that all the sources from the Christian era (↗Christianity) refer to the island as Dioskoridēs. Dibous has been alternatively identified with the Maldives (Fiaccadori 1992: xvi et passim) or Dēb, in the estuary of the Indus (Tardieu 1994: 61f. and nn. 11 and 13).

Two ancient texts shed light on the early settlements on S. The Periplus of the Erythraean Sea informs that the inhabitants of S. were settlers of Arabic, Indian and Greek origin and concentrated in the north of the island (Casson 1989, § 30). The island was under the kingdom of Ḥaḍramawt and trade was carried on with the ports of "Mouza" (Mocha) and "Limyrikè" and "Barygaza" (both near modern Mumbay) (Cuvigny 2010).

In the 6th cent. Cosmas Indicopleustes related that "the inhabitants, settlers who came with the Ptolemeans, successors of Alexander of Macedonia, speak Greek; there are priests ordained in Persia and sent to these regions as well as many Christians" (Wolska-Conus 1973: 65). Later references to a Christian presence on the island date to the 10th cent., with the Yemenite writer al-Ḥasan al-Hamdānī (ed. Müller 1884–91: 52f.), and the end of the 13th cent., with Marco ↗Polo. Polo added that the archbishop stayed in "Baudac [= Baghdad]", which would indicate that the island was under the Nestorian church (ed. Moule – Pelliot 1989, § 191; cf. also Ibn al-Muǧāwir, ed. Löfgren 1951–54: 266; Smith 1985). In the 16th cent. some Christian communities might still have existed but in the course of the 17th cent. they converted to Islam (Pereira 1923; cf. also Beckingham 1983; Müller 1999, 2001).

Until the recent findings at the cave of Ḥōq, the island's archaeological heritage was believed to be modest. These comprise tombs, some ruins and rock paintings (↗rock art; Doe 1992; Naumkin – Sedov 1993; Weeks et al. 2002). None of the ruins could be identified as a church, with the exception of a building that could have been a Portuguese church.

In 2000, the Belgian Socotra Karst Project-team directed by Peter De Geest explored the cave of Ḥōq, near the northeastern coast (Robin – Gorea 2002; Dridi 2002; 2012). The cave comprises two connecting galleries. In the first, remains of pottery and charcoal were found. The second produced more important findings, including a wooden tablet 50 cm x 20 cm, on which a text of 11 lines was written in the Palmyrene language and dating to July 258 (25 Tammûz 569; Gorea 2012); dozens of graffiti and signs produced on the rock and stalactites with the help of stones and charcoal; and about 20 incense burners and other tools.

The majority of the ↗inscriptions found at Ḥōq use Indian scripts (Strauch – Bukharin 2004; Strauch 2012) whilst about ten appear to be written in ↗Gə^{c}əz. Another ten are written in South Arabian (↗Epigraphic South Arabian) and four in Greek (Robin 2012; Bukharin 2012). Most of the texts are personal names. The findings date to ancient times and none is in Arabic or refers to Islam. They would have been produced over several centuries. A graffito in the Ḥaḍramī language is written in boustrophedon (from right to left in the first line and left to right in the second), which seems to point to an early date of composition.

Three Gə^{c}əz graffiti can be read: 'It is written: Blessed', ṣḥ(f)|bṣ́^{c} (2:25); bṣ́(^{c})|ṣḥ(f) (2:27); and (ṣ)ḥf|bṣ́^{c} (2:34). The interpretation is based either on the inscription of ↗Ham (RIÉ no. 232/7): bäkä^{6}mä ṣəḥuf bəṣ́u^{c} zäyətwällä^{7}d ᵓ*əm-*ᵓ*anəst*, 'as it is written: "Blessed he who is born of woman"', or on the Gädlä ↗Libanos (ᵓ*əsma halläwä ṣəḥifo Bəṣ́u*^{c}an ḫabä mədrä Dəgśa, 'since it was written, "Blessed" in the land of Dəgśa': Bausi 2003: 169ff. [text]), which probably refer to the message in the Gospels on the Beatitudes (Mt 5,1–12; Lk 6:20–23). According to this interpretation, these texts would have been written by Christians and at a late date, in the 4th cent. at the earliest. This dating could be further supported by the presence of such phenomena as the alternance ḍ/ṣ́ in the writing of bḍ^{c}/bṣ́^{c}, which is not widespread till post-Aksumite Gə^{c}əz. It is also in accordance with the name "Petros", probably Christian, found in one of the Greek graffiti. Together with the Palmyrene tablet, the numerous graffiti and inscriptions attest the use of the cave since ancient times. The site could have been associated with cults of the gods and spirits that would have been practiced by visitors in order to gain protection for forthcoming sea journeys.

Christian Julien Robin

Stone, Charles Pomeroy

S. pasha (b. 30 September 1824, Greenfield, MA, d. 24 January 1887, New York) was an American engineer, geographer and military commander in the services of the United States and Egypt. He played a crucial role during the ↗Egyptian–Ethiopian war of 1875–76. As president of the Société khédivale de géographie in Cairo he was responsible for important geographical expeditions which contributed to the exploration of north-eastern Africa.

S., the son of a medical doctor, in 1841 joined the United States Military Academy of West Point from which he graduated in 1845. He started his career as an ordnance officer at West Point where he taught geography and history. Later he participated in the Mexican war, but after 10 years of service left the US Army. He then worked several years for the Mexican government and as US consul in Guaymas, Mexico. In 1861 S. served in the Union Army in the American Civil War during which he was promoted to Brigadier General. After losing the Battle of Ball’s Bluff in October the same year, S. was imprisoned in 1862 for six months without any trial. This ended his military career and is regarded by military historians as being without precedence in American jurisprudence (Irwin 1887). S. was mustered out in 1864 and, thereafter, worked as an engineer.

In 1870, recommended by the US Commanding General, S. joined the army of ḫidīw ↗Ismāᶜīl bāšā as chief of staff and general aide-de-camp with the rank of lieutenant general (fariq bāšā). He also became the ḫidīw’s military advisor and in the same year started to train Egyptian staff. S. also established schools for Egyptian soldiers (among them North-east Africans) and their children whom he regarded as an important potential for the future modern Egyptian state. Starting from 1871 S. organized a dozen geographical expeditions to central and eastern Africa. They mapped wide regions, especially along the ↗Nile (Colston 1887; cp. Graves 1879 for a report on the ↗Mağeerteen). After the establishment of the Société khédivale de géographie by ↗Schweinfurth in 1875, S. became a member and later acted as its president.

In the Egyptian–Ethiopian war S. played a central role due to his position as chief of staff, together with several other Americans, such as ↗Loring and ↗Dye. The latter was appointed by S. adjutant general in that campaign and later also in the conflict with the ↗Mahdists.

Especially through his mapping and exploration activities, S. loyally supported the Egyptian efforts to expand into the Nile countries in order to create an economic basis for full Egyptian independence. After Ismāᶜīl had lost power, S. remained in the Egyptian army, now under ḫidīw Tawfīq. After Egypt with its dependencies became a British protectorate, however, S. returned to the United States in 1883 where he worked as an engineer on the foundation of the Statue of Liberty.

Strabo

S. (Στϱάβων, Strábōn, ca. 64/63 B.C., Amasea, Asia Minor, d. before 23/24 A.D.) was a Greek philosopher, historian and geographer. He was born to a prominent family of Cretan origin, whose members had held a high-ranking position since the middle of the 3rd cent. B.C. Most probably a Roman citizen (his family ranked among the clients of the gens Servilia), he studied at Nysa under Aristodemus and later in Rome under Xenarchus of Seleucia and Tyrannio of Amisus. Stoic philosophy deeply influenced S.’s writings, but whether he personally met its leader, Posidonius of Apamaea, is uncertain.

Only a few fragments of S.’s 47-book Historikà hypomnḗmata (‘Historical Commentaries’) are extant. His 17-book Geographiká (‘Geography’) has been transmitted almost entirely: it deals with Europe (III–X), Asia (XI–XVI) and Africa (XVII) and is the largest such work surviving from classical antiquity.

S. lived for many years in Alexandria (↗Egypt), where he had the opportunity of perusing the sources of his Geography. In keeping with the enkýklios paidéia (‘all-round education’) ideal, which included both the Stoic principle of universal learning and the Alexandrine idea of erudition as a basis for specialist training, the Geography combines mathematics and physics with history and philosophy (cp. Isnardi 1961: 257ff.) and is meant to provide detailed geographical data for statesmen and military leaders of the Roman empire (I, 1, 18).

Although ↗Ptolemy did not know of S.’s work, Marcianus of Heraclaea (in the 4th cent. A.D.) and especially Stephanus of Byzantium (in the 6th cent. A.D.) were familiar with it. It is to the latter age, which witnessed a renewed interest in geographical studies, that such an important testimony of S.’s text as the palimpsest discovered in 1844 and kept in the ↗Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana (mss. Vat. Gr. 2061 and 2306) should be probably dated. Excerpts, anthologies and précis of the Geography were compiled in Byzantian times (e.g., by Constantine Porphyrogenitus, 10th cent.); the original text was brought to Europe from Constantinople as early as 1423, and partially translated into Latin in 1453–58, its first printed edition appearing in 1516 (s. Lugato 1996: 20, no. XVI).

In books XVI and XVII of the Geography, devoted to the Middle East and to Africa, resp. (and preceded by book XV on the Far East), the bulk of the data are on ↗Aithiopía, a designation used for such countries of the ↗Red Sea and the ↗Indian Ocean as ↗Nubia and ↗Somalia, but sometimes for Ethiopia proper as well. The significance of S.’s work within the ↗Greek literature on those countries is manifold. In fact it preserves a good deal of contemporary geographical knowledge, but also, along with the author’s own notes, offers a selection of passages on “Ethiopia” from the lost works of his predecessors: Ephorus, Posidonius, Hipparchus, Eratosthenes and Artemidorus, the latter two being of special value for both the “supra Aegyptum” (i.e. beyond Nubia) and the South Arabian domains.

S.’s extensive sections on Aithiopía (esp. XVII, but s. also I, 2–5 and 3, 1–10) are intertwined with scholastic interpretations of descriptions found in Homer (I, 1, 3–6; 2, 3; 2, 20–28; 2, 31; VII, 3, 6; XVI, 4, 27), whose authority in geographical matters is very much emphasized by S. Noteworthy is, in particular, his commentary on the remote Homeric “Ethiopians”, living at the edge of the inhabited earth and “sundered in twain, the farthermost of men” (Od. I, 23). S. introduces several contemporary explanations for this image (I, 2, 20–28):

1) there actually are two different groups of “Ethiopians” in two different worlds (our own and a presumed one in the southern hemisphere), separated on the Equator by the Ocean;

2) the Indians (↗“India” is used as a name of Ethiopia) are the eastern, as opposed to the western, i.e. African, Ethiopians (s. Schneider 2004: 533f.);

3) the ↗Nile divides Aithiopía, and therefore its inhabitants, into two parts;

4) a distinction is implied between the “Ethiopians” living in the eastern and western parts of “Libya”, i.e. Africa, resp. S.’s own explanation, to "set the poet [i.e. Homer] free from the charge of gross ignorance" (I, 2, 27), is that the name "Ethiopians" is given to two groups dwelling along the southern shore of the Ocean, yet separated from each other by the Arabian Gulf – which "constitutes a considerable part of a meridian circle" – as if by a river (I, 2, 28; cp. II, 3, 7f.).

S.'s Aithiopía has its northern boundaries in the area of Syḗnē (today's Aswān), with the island of Elephantínē in the centre of the Nile (it marked the original Egyptian border to the south), and shows "some continuity" (koinà mèn gár tina) with Egypt because of the Nile flowing through both: only the part that "is covered during the floods" (tò kalyptómenon en taîs plēmmyrísi) are habitable, whereas "the higher part that is at a greater altitude than its current" (tò d'hyperdéxion kaì meteōróteron toû rheúmatos) are uninhabited and desert (XVII, 1, 3). Following Eratosthenes, S. distinguishes Trog(l)odytikḗ from Aithiopía (XVI, 4, 4). He also focuses on the sources of the Nile (I, 1, 25; II, 3, 3; IV, 1, 7; XV, 1, 19), its stream to the Delta, with the tributary Astaboras (↗Atbara; XVII, 1, 2), as well as on the distances of Ethiopian locations from Egypt (XVII, 3, 1).

S. is one of the few ancient geographers who can claim to have reached the borders of Aithiopía (II, 5, 11). He did participate in the failed expedition of his patron Aelius Gallus, the Roman prefect of Egypt (26–24 B.C.) who was sent by Augustus to explore the coasts of Arabia (II, 5, 12). As an eye-witness, S. offers an important account of that expedition (XVI, 4, 22ff.). Yet, it was not his own experience, but the inconsistencies he found in the story of Eudoxus of Cyzicus that led S. to doubt the latter's account. In the 2nd cent. B.C., Eudoxus had attempted to circumnavigate Africa: according to him, on the western Libyan shores the same language was spoken as that of the Ethiopians (II, 3, 4–5).

As to the relationships with the Greek and Roman world, S. records a great increase of ↗trade in his times: from India and "the extremities [tà ákra] of Aithiopía" Egypt imported "the most valuable cargoes", with precious merchandises "brought down by the Arabian Gulf" and "carried to Coptus" (XVII, 1, 13 and 43, s. De Romanis 1996: 121ff.). At the end of his work he admits that the regions beyond Aithiopía are unknown (XVII, 3, 23).

The Geography yields information on ↗Napata as "the royal residence of (the) ↗Candace" (tò basíleion tēs Kandákēs): the former capital of the kingdom of ↗Kush, it had been long since superseded by ↗Meroë (XVII, 1, 53). S.'s text contains the report of a clash between the army of Queen Amanirenase – actually a Meroitic Candace – and Roman troops (1, 54). As a result, this part of Aithiopía, i.e. (Lower) Nubia, was put under the guard of three cohorts, based at Syḗnē (1, 12).

Other aspects of the political history of Aithiopía are found only in this work. E.g., the Egyptian pharaoh Sesôstris was "the first man to subdue the countries of the Ethiopians and the Troglodytes" and to "have traversed the whole of Aithiopía as far as the Cinnamon-bearing country", i.e. ↗Somalia (XVI, 4, 4f.). Meroë itself, "metropolis of the Ethiopians" (I, 2, 25), was named after the sister (or wife) of the Persian king Cambyses who occupied that area (XVII, 1, 4). Tarkos (i.e. Taharqa), the "Ethiopian" ruler of the 25th Egyptian dynasty (↗"Ethiopian dynasty"), advanced with his army as far as Europe (XV, 1, 6).

Along with portrayals of the country's fauna and flora (XV, 1, 22; XVII, 1, 40, 49; 2, 1–4; 3, 5), and with a notable mention of the ↗papyrus (s. EAE vol. 5) plant growing around a freshwater lake to be found on the Somalian coast (XVI, 4, 14, s. Lewis 1974: 5f.), there are a few ethnographic descriptions of the "Ethiopians" (the term being here broadly understood). S. mentions their nomadic way of life (XVII, 1, 3), their diet, based on millet, barley, grass and even meat and milk (2, 2), the weapons they use, i.e. clubs, ↗spears, bows and raw ox-hide shields (XVI, 4, 4; XVII, 1, 54; 3, 7), and the way they revere their kings as gods (2, 2). The distinctive black complexion of the "Ethiopians" is also mentioned (XV, 1, 24), as are a few other characteristics about them: they go naked or wear small sheep-skins round their loins, and most women have a copper ring through the lip (XVII, 2, 3). A recurrent motif is a comparison between these people and the Indians (II, 4, 7; XV, 1, 13, 19, 24). All such details reflect current Greek conceptions of the Ethiopians, and add to the work's invaluable importance.

In S.'s view, South ↗Arabia, opposite to Aithiopía, is shared by four great nations (XVI, 4, 2): the Minaîoi (Minaeans, i.e. "people of Maʿīn") on the Red Sea, whose capital is Kárna (Qarnaw), the Sabaeans (↗Sabaʾ), with their chief town at Maríaba (Maʾrib); the Kattabaneîs (Qatabanians, i.e. "people of Qatabān"), near the straits of Bāb al-Mandab, whose king resides in Támna (Timnaʿ); still farther east, the inhabitants of Chatramōtîtis (↗Ḥaḍramawt), with their city Sábata (Šabwa). The region of Kattabaneîs produces frankincense (↗Incense), whereas Chatramōtîtis is rich in myrrh, and an extremely lucrative trade in these and other spices flourishes there thanks to merchants journeying from Áilana (^{c}Ayla/^{c}Ēylāṯ) to the Minaean territory in 70 days; the Gabaîoi (Gabaeans, variant Gerraîoi) – a prominent group of Minaeans – reach Chatramōtîtis in 40 days.

Besides Eratosthenes, S.'s main source here was, avowedly, the 2nd cent. B.C. geographer Artemidorus of Ephesus, whose almost completely lost work included accurate descriptions of the same theme (book VIII). However, these descriptions were no longer applicable at the time of S.: the situation of South Arabian kingdoms had dramatically changed since the disappearance of Ma^{c}īn in the 2nd cent. B.C.

T

Tädla ᶜOq̱bit

Lieutenant General T.ᶜO. (ተድላ ፡ ዖቕቢት; b. 1923 ᶜAddi Mängʷänti, near Mändäfära, d. 11 June 1963, Asmära) was a high ranking police officer and resolute advocate for the union of Eritrea with Ethiopia (↗Unionist Party).

T.ᶜO. entered public service in the immediate aftermath of the British military victory over the Italian colonial forces in Eritrea in 1941 (↗War of Liberation). After training at Däqqämḥare police academy, he worked as an assistant to Police Commissioner Colonel Wright during the ↗British Military Administration of Eritrea (B.M.A.). In preparation for the post-B.M.A. Eritrean assumption of command of the police, T.ᶜO. was dispatched to England in 1951 for training, together with six other young Eritreans. At the end of the B.M.A. and the onset of the ↗Ethiopian–Eritrean Federation in 1952, T.ᶜO. was among the highest-ranking officers whose promotion and appointment to active duty, however, was impeded by political wrangling surrounding the Federation.

The first few years of the doomed Federation saw the emergence of two political trends: on the one hand, there were Unionists who advocated complete merger with Ethiopia and, on the other hand, a new group of federalists determined to retain Eritrean autonomy against intensifying Ethiopian interference. Meanwhile, no sooner did ↗Tädla Bayru become the first Chief Executive of the Government of Eritrea than he was accused of nepotism and regionalism. As the Chief Executive became embroiled in political squabbles with the judiciary, opposition parliamentarians, and the all-powerful representative of the Crown, T.ᶜO. openly sided with the Unionists and blamed the blocking of his promotion to Commander of the newly constituted Eritrean Police on Tädla Bayru.

These two realities did not escape to Addis Abäba, which forced the Chief Executive to reinstate T.ᶜO., who then became Deputy Police Commissioner. In September 1955, he succeeded the outgoing Police Commissioner David Cracknell as a full Colonel.

Around the same time, ↗Asfəḥa Wäldä Mikaʾel replaced Tädla Bayru as Chief Executive. With a like-minded Unionist at the helm, T.ᶜO. gained direct access to the highest centres of power in Asmära and exercised unrestrained authority. Held in great awe by his subordinates and the public at large, T.ᶜO. was at the forefront of every major political event in Eritrean politics during his time in office.

He is blamed for harassing non-Unionists during the 1956 parliamentary elections, which helped secure a Unionist majority in the new Eritrean Parliament. He (along with Asmära Police Commissioner Colonel Goytom Gäbräʾəgzi) was instrumental in the brutal suppression of the March 1958 labour strikes across Eritrean towns.

After a spontaneous student protest in September 1960, T.ᶜO. personally interrogated some of the organizers whom he suspected of conspiring with the abortive ↗Coup d'état 1960 in Addis Abäba (s. EAE vol. 2, 1081f.). It is reported that ↗Gärmame and ↗Mängəśtu Nəway had sought T.ᶜO.'s assistance in securing Asmära for the coup, but T.ᶜO. remained loyal to aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I.

Although T.ᶜO. was promoted to Lieutenant General of the police, his position started to deteriorate after the appointment of the Šäwan General ↗ᶜAbiyy Abbäbä (s. EAE vol. 5) as Imperial Representative in Asmära in 1959. After the beginning of the Eritrean armed struggle in September 1961, and the official dissolution of the Federation in November 1962, ᶜAbiyy Abbäbä was appointed Governor General of Eritrea, and T.ᶜO. (like many Eritreans who had previously advocated union with Ethiopia) became redundant to the central government in Addis Abäba.

Meanwhile, T.ᶜO. is believed to have refused to report to the new regional minister of the interior, which put him on a collision course with the new power structure. Against the instructions to report to Addis Abäba for a transfer, he sought to mobilize his subordinates in Asmära. He reportedly started agitating against Addis Abäba, ordering his officers to raise the Eritrean flag, secure the arms depot and prepare for any eventuality. It is rumoured that on 10 June 1963 he even tried to contact the ↗Eritrean Liberation Movement which had been struggling for independence through a "revolutionary coup d'état" with the support of the police. The next day he was found dead in his office with a pistol in his hand.

The official explanation is that he committed suicide, which many dismiss out of hand. Once held in as high esteem by some as others feared him, T.ᶜO. was quietly buried the next day in his home village with a small family funeral.

He was survived by his wife and six children.

Täsfa Ṣəyon

T.Ṣ. (ተስፋ ፡ ጽዮን; b. 1508–10, Ethiopia, d. 28 August 1550 [or 1552, s. Euringer 1926], Tivoli), better known by his monastic name Ṗeṭros (hence Petrus Aethiops or Ethiops, Ethyops, 'Peter the Ethiopian', and Pietro Indiano, 'Peter the Indian'), was an Ethiopian monk renowned for his activity in Rome, at ↗Santo Stefano dei Mori – as early as 1536, according to Sebastian ↗Euringer's chronology (Euringer 1926). His other names were "Tesfa Zeon Malezo" (i.e. "T.Ṣ. Malḫəzo", as in the autograph note of ms. VatLib Aeth. 16, fol. 61v, cp. GréTisVat I, 65) and "Tesfa Zior Malbazo" (rather a misspelling for "T. Zion Malhazo"), occurring in his edition of the Ethiopic ↗New Testament, and, resp., in his Latin/Ethiopic epitaph of 28 August 1550 (Malḫəzo might be an official title assumed as a [nick]name, malḥaza/-əzo appearing as an ecclesiastical title, however obscure, in a 1225 document of the Golden Gospel of ↗Däbrä Libanos of Ham, ed. CRDLib 190, no. 7A: cp. Ar. mulāḥiẓ, 'overseer'?). This famous epitaph is still visible at Santo Stefano dei Mori (Euringer 1926; CRStor tav. I, fig. 3; Levi Della Vida 1939: 140f. n. 6) and was copied, among others, by Johann Michael ↗Wansleben (cp. Bausi 1991: 20).

T.Ṣ. played a pivotal role in the two-year long preparation of one of the most important Ethiopic ↗incunabula: the Roman editio princeps of the ↗Gəᶜəz N.T. His Testamentum Novum was printed in two volumes: vol. 1 (with the ↗Gospels, the ↗Revelation, the ↗Epistle to the Hebrews, the Acts of the ↗Apostles, as well as the Mass ritual [Mäṣḥafä ↗qəddase] and three Ethiopic anaphoras and a prayer, cc. 1–12 not numbered + 1–176) appeared in 1548, vol. 2 (with the other Pauline Epistles obtained only later from ↗Cyprus, cc. 177–226), in 1549 (s. Raineri 2000: 410–14, no. 117; Fiaccadori 2009: 34f.). This work was carried out within the framework of the so-called Catholic reformed circle – inspired mainly by Cardinals Reginald Pole and Niccolò Ridolfi – and its interests in Oriental languages and cultures relevant to biblical studies, and with the assistance of other fellow monks from Santo Stefano dei Mori and such learned men from the Papal Curia as Pietro Paolo Gualtieri, later archdeacon of the Cathedral of Arezzo (Levi Della Vida 1939: 144f. n. 5; Messina 1943: 86f.), Mariano ↗Vittori from Rieti (Wilkinson 2007: 69 and n. 23) and Canon Bernardino Sandri from Cremona (cp. Kristeller 1965: 209).

However, very little information is available on T.Ṣ.'s career and education in Ethiopia. In the Latin part of his epitaph, reportedly dictated by Gualtieri himself, he is labelled as eremita Aethiopos, 'Ethiopian hermit', and said to be nobiliss(imis) pare(n)ti(bus) natus, 'born to most noble parents' – possibly a topos or a simple boasting. From the remarks printed at the end of each book of his 1548 N.T. edition, it seems that his life was severely troubled by the Muslim wars waged by ↗Aḥmad b. Ibrāhīm al-Ġāzī (Aḥmad Grañ) against Christian Ethiopia (cp., e.g., Petrus Ethiops 1548, c. 110, on Grañ's devastation; for further references, Lefevre 1970, passim). In the first colophon of the same edition (c. 6t), as well as in other documents, T.Ṣ. is said to belong to "the monastic family of abunä [↗]Täklä Haymanot of [↗]Däbrä Libanos" and ranks as ↗qomos ("impensis Petri Comos Ethiopis"). In a brief (breve) of 14 September 1548, Pope Paul III styles T.Ṣ. as a familiaris of aṣe ↗Gälawdewos (ibid. 93); and T.Ṣ. claims to be a "secretary" to this emperor in a 1547 Gəᶜəz letter to his friend Gualtieri (whom he addresses calling himself his "servant") on the progress of the N.T. edition (Guidi 1886: 275). Yet, Gälawdewos ascended the throne in 1540, i.e. at least four years after T.Ṣ.'s arrival in Rome.

T.Ṣ.'s preface to his N.T.'s edition as well as other sources report the fact that he spent a few years as a pilgrim in ↗Jerusalem, which he had reached with two fellow monks. It was only then that he moved to Rome, probably via Venice: following Euringer's sound chronology, this would have been 1536 at the latest, as, in that year, he had already translated the Ethiopic letters brought by João ↗Bermudez on the occasion of his visit to Pope Paul III in order to be appointed patriarch of Ethiopia (cp. Pennec 1999: 211 and n. 39). However, T.Ṣ.'s 1550 epitaph, attributing his death to "a long illness" (longo morbo confectus, possibly tuberculosis, s. CRStor 11), says that he spent 12 years in Rome and lived for 42 years, thus placing his arrival in Rome in 1538.

T.Ṣ. was able to finance in full his publication of the N.T. Only too aware of a few misprints in his edition, he rightly attributed them to the pioneering character of the enterprise. In 1549, he also published Gualtieri's Latin translation – reprinted several times thereafter (cp. GréTisVat I, 61f.) – of the baptismal order (Mäṣḥafä ↗krəstənna) and of the Mass ritual (this had been already included in the 1548 N.T. edition). The translations were followed by a letter of Gälawdewos to Pope Paul III (cf. Duensing 1904 and Raineri 2005: 79–83, no. 13) and some notes concerning the books T.Ṣ. had already printed (s. mss. VatLib Aeth. 16 and 75, GréTisVat I, 61–65 and 283; cp. also Wilkinson 2007: 70 and n. 29).

An expert in ↗Amharic, Gə^{c}əz and Arabic, as well as in Italian and Latin, the most learned T.Ṣ. afforded constant inspiration for new studies on Ethiopia. He participated in the revision of the Italian version of Francisco ↗Alvares's report that was prepared by the Italian humanist and archbishop Ludovico Beccadelli (Raineri 2007: 13f., 177f., cp. BeckHuntAlvar 110 n. 2) and gave information on Ethiopia to Paolo ↗Giovio. Moreover, the first Gə^{c}əz grammar, with a short historical sketch, written by Mariano Vittori in 1552, draws on information provided by T.Ṣ., who financed the publication of this book, too.

T.Ṣ. was also instrumental both in the definitive establishment of a Vatican hospice for Ethiopian monks and pilgrims under the pope's auspices at Santo Stefano dei Mori and in directing the attention of the Catholic Church to the faith, customs and doctrine of Christian Ethiopians. A few manuscripts owned or annotated by him that were already in Santo Stefano dei Mori (and partly used for his editions) are now kept in the ↗Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana: VatLib Aeth. 5, 15, 23, 25 and, resp., 16 (fol. 61v), 68 (fols. 125v–26r, s. GréTisVat I, 20f., 45–61, 116, 127–31 and 65, 249f.; cp. Raineri 2000: 167f., no. 18).

In keeping with his Roman activity, T.Ṣ. also insisted on the need of appointing a Catholic patriarch to Ethiopia and, no later than January 1549, met ↗Ignatius of Loyola, who eventually was to establish a ↗Jesuit mission to Christian Ethiopia (Ignatius de Loyola 1904:304ff., cp. Lefevre 1970:98ff. and Pennec 1999:211ff. and n. 40).

T.Ṣ. enjoyed close relationships with several prominent figures in Rome, including Pope Paul III (whom he tried to persuade to build a temple dedicated to the Virgin and the Seven Angels, i.e. the future basilica of Santa Maria degli Angeli), the pope's spiritual daughter Girolama Orsini Farnese, mentioned as a benefactress of T.Ṣ. in the N.T. edition, and Cardinal Pietro Bembo. With Cardinal Marcello Cervini (later Pope Marcel II) he conceived new editorial projects, which were never realized due to his premature death, as stated in his epitaph: "… perfecturu(s) si vixisset" (cp. Levi Della Vida 1939: 140f. and Wilkinson 2007: 69 and n. 26).

In Rome, he was also in contact with such scholars as the famous Orientalist and Cabbalist (and former Jesuit) Guillaume Postel, deeply interested in "Chaldaean", i.e. Ethiopian culture. T.Ṣ. might well be the noster Niger ('our Black [man]') who accompanied him in his 1549 journey to the East, namely to Jerusalem (Kuntz 1981: 99 n. 316, but s. Wilkinson 2007: 68 and n. 21, 114 n. 62).

Before 1548/49, T.Ṣ. befriended the ↗Jacobite priest, Moses of Mārdīn, who was sent to Rome by his patriarch, Ignatius ^{c}Abdallāh of Antioch to procure Syriac printed Bibles. Moses soon established relationships with representatives of the Catholic reformation – besides Gualtieri and Vittori, also Cardinals Pole and Cervini (Levi Della Vida 1939: 142ff. and n. 5).

At Santo Stefano dei Mori, on commission by T.Ṣ. (the senior scholar there), Moses prepared a copy of the Roman Missal in Syriac script, with rubrics in Arabic (now ms. BritLib Harley 5512), and with a colophon, also in Arabic (ġaršūnī), fol. 174v, mentioning "Bishop Ṣayhūn [usquf Ṣ., likely to be read Tasfā Ṣ., i.e. T.Ṣ.] the Abyssinian, son of the great Levi(te) prince [ibn al-amīr al-kabīr lāwī] <from among> the relatives of the sultan [= king] of the land of (the) Abyssinia(ns)" (Levi Della Vida 1939: 142ff. and n. 5: "figlio del grande principe Lāwī"; cp. Wilkinson 2007: 68 n. 20). This source actually reports the profession, rather than the name, of T.Ṣ.'s father: a "priest" of princely family – in accordance with T.Ṣ.'s own assertion of nobility, eventually mirrored in his epitaph.

Evidence of T.Ṣ.'s prestigious position is the variety of titles with which he is referred to in the documents of the papal chancellery, such as "professor" and "abbas", while the 1548 pontifical brief (already inspired by Moses?) mentions T.Ṣ.'s appointment to "Comos ecclesiae maioris [i.e. the cathedral] civitatis Mardin, ac Abbatem monasterii Montis Libani [i.e. Däbrä Libanos] totiusque praedictae provinciae Sceua [↗Šäwa]" by an otherwise unknown "Armenian" archbishop named "Martinus" (Lefevre 1970: 93f.; on T.Ṣ.'s activities and acquaintances in Rome, s. Guidi 1886). He also attended the 1549/50 conclave, in which Pope Julius III (d. 1555) was elected.

T.Ṣ.'s historical importance is clearly reflected in his portrait as it appears in two paintings of the Roman churches of Il Gesù (antesacristy, anon., ca. 1615–25) and Santa Maria degli Angeli (chapel of the Saviour, by Giulio Mazzoni the "Piacentino", shortly after 1574) that show him next to the pope. In the former (s. ill.), T.Ṣ. is seen, together with Bishop Filippo Archinto (vicar-general of Rome) and Cardinal Alessandro Farnese, next to Paul III (1534–49) who is receiving for approval, from Ignatius of Loyola, the Formula of the Institute, i.e. the foundational document of the Society of Jesus, in 1540 (this episode seems to suggest a terminus post quem for the saint's acquaintance with T.Ṣ.). In the latter painting, T.Ṣ. stands next to Pius IV (1559–65) who is praying before prominent people – among them Girolama Orsini Farnese – connected with the foundation of Santa Maria degli Angeli (ordered by the pope in 1561) and distinguished members of the confraternity in charge of the Saviour's chapel.

T. (ትንሶኬ) in ↗Gärᶜalta is the site of two ↗rock-hewn churches. They are cut in the southern part of the massif which rises south-west of the road connecting Ḥawzen and Tämben.

The first church was visited by David Buxton and Ruth ↗Plant. According to their report (plan in Plant – Buxton 1970: 206), it is dedicated to the Archangel Michael (Tənsoḵe Mikaᵓel) and is composed of three parts: pronaos, mid-room and sanctuary. The pronaos, accessible from the west, is rectangular and circa 10 m wide, partly hewn (northern and north-eastern wall and northern part of the ceiling) and partly constructed (western and southern walls, a fragment of eastern wall and the remaining part of the roof). Two openings in the eastern wall (the northern one screened) lead eastwards to a room similar to the pronaos in form and size but entirely cut into the rock. Its southern side is prolonged eastwards by an ambulatory closed from the south by a constructed wall axing the wall of the pronaos. This wall is pierced in the middle by a large, but blocked entry and three windows. The sanctuary is the easternmost room and is entirely hewn. It is accessed by two doors, from the west and from the south. The southern door, with a step, has a framing of Aksumite type. It is possible that on the list of Tewelde Medhin Joseph (in PICES 3) this church appears as the one dedicated to the Four Heavenly Creatures (Tənsok̠e Arbaᶜətu Ǝnsəsa).

The second church, unexplored to date, is dedicated to abunä Zämikaᵓel Arägawi (Tənsok̠e Arägawi, s. Plant – Buxton 1970:182).

Tərdaᵓ Gäbäz

T.G. (ትርዳእ ፡ ገበዝ) was a legendary princess connected with the transition from the ruling house of Aksum to the new dynasty of the ↗Zagʷe through her marriage into this family.

A document at ↗Däbrä Libanos of Ham has it that she succeeded to the last Aksumite king, Ḥəzbänay, i.e. Ḥəzbä Nañ, and handed the throne over to the Zagʷe (Conti Rossini 1922:280f.; cp. Huntingford 1965:1). In other versions of the same episode, echoed by Mariano ↗Vittori (Victorius 1522, fol. H = [37]v: “Tredda gabez”, cp. Conti Rossini 1895–96:145–51), she appears as the daughter of Ḥəzbä Nañ and the spouse of a chief of ↗Bugna, the ↗Agäw district the Zagʷe originally came from. Upon her father’s death, she seized power in the interest of her son; she killed all the members of the legitimate ↗Solomonic dynasty but one, who fled to ↗Šäwa, establishing there a branch of the family from which aṣe ↗Yəkunno Amlak was to descend (Belaynesh Michael in DicEthBio 162).

The stories about T.G. – sometimes confused with Queen Gudit (↗Ǝsato) in modern scholarship – show a curious resemblance with the well-known and much more detailed lore on Mäsobä Wärq, the daughter of King ↗Dəlnaᶜod, also featuring as the last Aksumite ruler (Conti Rossini 1903:5f. and Id. 1917:707; cp. Belaynesh Michael in DicEthBio 111f.). Under the latter’s reign, in either 870/71 or 975/76 A.D., the kingdom is said to have moved “from Aksum [Akʷəsəm] to the land of the east [bəḥerä məśraq]”, i.e. to the Lake ↗Ḥayq zone (KurMoa 18, s. TadTChurch 36 n. 3).

According to various traditions associated, again, with Däbrä Libanos, but also with Däbrä Ḥayq, Mäsobä Wärq married one of her father’s generals, (Mära) Täklä Haymanot of the family of Ḥepaṣa (from Bugna), who later defeated and slew Dəlnaᶜod assuming power with the royal name of Zawge, sc. Zagʷe (traced to a hypocoristic form of a more familiar Zäwgä Mikaᵓel, ‘Companion of [St.] Michael’, or a similar name, s. CRStor 305), and becoming thereby the first ruler of this line (SerHist 235f., 242; Belaynesh Michael in DicEthBio 156) – which more likely started, though, in the first half of the 12th cent.

Such a chronology would also be fitting for Mäsobä Wärq, should she actually be the wife of Täklä Haymanot and the mother of his sons: Ṭänṭäwəddəm, Gərma Śəyyum, Žan Śəyyum and ↗Yəmrəḥannä Krəstos (cp. SerHist 242).

Now, the name Tərdaᵓ Gäbäz, ‘May the ↗Gäbäz [i.e. the Cathedral of ↗Aksum (Ṣəyon) or the Virgin ↗Mary as the latter’s patron] give help’ (Conti Rossini 1922:375), is possibly a war-cry, given as a nickname (Belaynesh Michael in DicEthBio 162); and it has been suggested that it was a byname for Mäsobä Wärq, the two princesses being thus one and the same person.

Albeit confused and uncertain, all sources, however, agree that a woman was instrumental in the transfer of power to the Zagʷe, who based their legitimacy on marriage to a member of the Solomonic family.

Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Theophilus the Indian

Th. (b. 320 ca., d. after 364), also called "the Ethiopian" or "the Blemys" (↗Blemmyes, s. EAE vol. 5), here possibly a derogatory term (for the confusion involved s. ↗"India" as a name of Ethiopia), was an Arian bishop and missionary (↗Arius). His personal circumstances are chiefly known from the surviving fragments of the Historia ecclesiastica by his contemporary, the Arian Philostorgius (II, 6; III, 4–6a and 15; IV, 1 and 7–8; V, 4; VII, 6; VIII, 1–2; IX, 1, 3, and 18; s. ↗Historiography: Ancient Greek and Roman Historiography).

Th. is said to be originally from the island of Dibē(s). This has been variously identified with ↗Diu (on the Cambay Gulf), Ceylon, ↗Soqotra (s. EAE vol. 5), ↗Dahlak, etc., but can more safely be equated to the Arab Dībā or Dīwa Maḥall (the present-day Malé/Māle atoll[s]) in the Maldives (Malé Diva), off the Kerala coast (for its ancient history, based on scant external reports, s. Fritz 2002: 4f.). Still a young man, Th. was sent as a hostage to the court of Emperor Constantine by his compatriots, also "known as Indians". This suggests that he belonged to a prominent, if not princely, family of Dibē(s), and was probably sent there in order to guarantee local ↗trade by Roman merchants. At the court in Constantinople, Th. was then instructed about ↗Christianity by the Arian Eusebius of Nicomedia, bishop of that city from 338/39 to ca. 342, who later ordained him deacon. By that time, Th. must have been at least 20 years old.

Th. soon became a confidant of the young Constantius II, who had him appointed bishop at an unknown age and, between 341 and 346 (probably before 344), sent him as an ambassador to the "ethnarch of the Sabaeans", i.e. the king of ↗Ḥimyar, with 200 horses and other gifts. This diplomatic mission took place during the reign of Malkīkarib Yuhaʾmin (Mlkykrb Yhʾmn) or of his father Ṯaʾrān Yuhanʿim (Ṯʾrʾn Yhnʿm), both known from South Arabian ↗inscriptions. The purpose of such religious diplomacy – indeed part of a wider plan by Constantius himself (cp. Fernández 1989) – was the spread of Christianity in its Arian mould as imposed then by Byzantium (↗Byzantine Empire) on Alexandria (↗Egypt).

During his journey, falling within the first period of hostility between Constantius and the Sasanian emperor Šābur II (↗Iran), and politically aimed at neutralizing any Persian intervention in the region, Th. founded no less than three churches: in Ḥimyar's capital city, Tápharos or Ẓafār; in the Rhōmaikòn empórion ('Roman trading centre'), i.e. ʿAden (↗Yemen); and in the Persikòn empórion ('Persian trading centre') "at the mouth of the Persian Gulf", which is perhaps the old Hurmūz rather than ʿAyn Ḥumrān or Ṣuḥār, both along the coast of today's ↗Oman (s. Clapp 1998:212 and, resp., Bowersock 2004: 264f.). The Metaphrastic version of the Martyrdom of ↗Arethas and, earlier, its Vorlage (BHG^{3} 167 and 166z) make him an "Orthodox" and the chief evangelizer of South Arabia, from ↗Nağrān to the Persian Gulf.

From the land of the Ḥimyarites Th. then returned to his native Dibē(s) and to the "other India", i.e. to Malabar, where Arian communities seem to have settled prior to his visit. In his double capacity of legate and presumably bishop, he limited himself to confirming them in their faith ("as they had, since the very beginning honoured the heteroousia", i.e. the Trinitarian [↗Trinity] doctrine denying the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son) and to amending the "liturgical" errors and deformations they had acquired, such as hearing the Gospel and worshipping seated – which is, however, in the Hindu tradition (Poggi 1995: 608).

Later, in the age of King ↗ʿEzana and his brother ↗SʿZN(H) (the addressees of a famous letter by Constantius II, s. ↗Athanasius), and after a second journey to Ḥimyar, "from this great Arabia", Th. "reached the Ethiopians called Aksumites" (↗Aksum), on the opposite shore of the Red Sea. He is unlikely to have attained diplomatic or confessional successes there, where Frumentius (↗Sälama Käśate Bərhan) was already a bishop appointed by Athanasius of Alexandria. Nonetheless, the local diffusion of Arian and neo-Arian elements as well as the inscriptional evidence for an anti-Arian ↗Christology should be carefully evaluated in this connection (Fiaccadori 2003: 251–55; cp. Black 2008: 104–08 and 110).

Th. eventually went on to Antioch, "where he stayed", being held in honour at the court of Caesar Gallus. The latter was put to death in Istria (today's Croatia) by the emperor who, doubting his loyalty, had him come there from Antioch, with Th., in 354.

Banished as a supporter of Gallus, Th. was soon recalled to the Byzantine capital because of his fame as a miracle-worker: at Antioch he had reportedly raised a man from dead; in Constantinople he healed Empress Eusebia from a serious distemper or mental disease. Yet, alternately in and out of favour with the court, he was again banished by Constantius II, who exiled him to Heraclea Pontica in 359/60, on account of the "insinuations" of Basil of Ancyra regarding his deeper involvement in the "plot" of Gallus. These were equally directed against the bishop of Antioch Eudoxios and the neo-Arian theologian Aetius, the founder and head of the "Anomoeans", an offshoot of the Arians that was strongly disliked by the emperor. Th. was doubtlessly linked on both personal and doctrinal grounds; in 360, when he was already a bishop, Th. witnessed the enthronement of Eudoxius and refused to sign the "anti-Aetian" document as exacted by Constantius.

In 362, the exiles having been recalled by Emperor Julian the Apostate, Th. took part in the synod at Constantinople that sanctioned both the return of Aetius, who was immediately made a bishop, and the legitimacy of his creed. Thus, in the time of Emperor Jovian, between 27 June 363 and 17 February 364, "on his own initiative", Th. returned to Antioch in order to obtain the complete rehabilitation of Aetius (d. 365/66). In so doing, by then under Emperor Valens, he brought upon himself and his friend the anger of the local bishop Euzoius (361–76), forced to fight against a strenuous faction of Anomoeans.

Titles, ranks and functions

The complex history of the Horn of Africa has known a wide range of state, religious and ethnic formations. All of these used different terms for the endless list of functions and offices existing in that specific society.

Brief information on various titles and offices is presented in the overview table printed on pages 580–90 of this volume.

Topography, historical

Historical T. (from Greek tópos 'place' and gráphein 'to write, to describe') is, in its broader sense, the scientific investigation of places in their historical development, and thus overlaps at large with historical ↗geography. T. is intended here instead in its narrower sense of scientific investigation of place names as such – i.e. under the linguistic point of view as well as from that of their documentation.

There have been very few systematic topographic surveys of Ethiopia or Eritrea. The exceptions were attempts at investigations of a specific topographic character in very specific areas or periods (s., e.g., Beckingham 1959; Fauvelle-Aymar et al. 2006). Most of these focused on ↗Aksum or are of archaeological character (s. DAE I [Reisebericht der Expedition: Topographie und Geschichte Aksum]; Monneret de Villard 1938, which is one of the very few rigorous essays in historical T. proper, s. Littmann 1939; Fattovich et al. 2000).

As to topographic documentation, already in 1894 Conti Rossini produced a general catalogue of all place names occurring in Ethiopic texts (in Gəᶜəz, to a much more limited extent in Amharic). His small, but remarkable, index was later resumed by Huntingford (1962, 1969, HuntGeogr) – with substantial limitation to the same classes of texts, i.e. the historiographical and hagiographic, with consideration of a few documentary ones. This remains the largest collection of historical place names with sources references available so far. Indexes of non-indexed specific historical texts have also been compiled in recent years, e.g., the three Chronicles of Tewodros II (Sokolinskaia 2004), the Mäṣḥafä Aksum (Bausi 2006), the documentary texts from the Golden Gospel (↗Wängelä wärq) of Däbrä Libanos (Id. 2007), and the Royal Chronicle for the years 1769–1840 (Raineri 2010). The large documentary body of land grants and feudal deeds (↗gʷəlt), which is an essential source for the historical documentation of place names since the 13th cent. at the latest, has received considerable attention in the last decades (cf., e.g., CrumLand), but it has not yet received a general systematization in a comprehensive catalogue.

The colonial Italian occupation of Eritrea and later of Ethiopia provided the occasion for collecting extensively place names, even though no systematic and exhaustive large scale enterprise resulting in a general catalogue was ever undertaken by Italian authorities either. Just to mention some essays and efforts in the course of time, Perini (1903) published a valuable collection of Eritrean settlements; Cerulli (1928) dealt with Ethiopian place names collected in the course of his ethnographic research in Southern Ethiopia in 1927; Bombaci et al. (1937), in a propagandistic perspective, published a survey of Ethiopian place names on the base of the 1:1,000,000 map (occasionally of the 1:400,000 map) of the Istituto Geografico Militare; and the Ministero dell'Africa Italiana (n.d. [ca. 1938]) provided a list of place names contained in the A.O.I. 1:200,000 map. Years later and within a different context, a dictionary of Ethiopian geographical names was compiled by Gorovaja (1974) and a comprehensive list of place names (Gazetteer of Ethiopia) by the U.S.A. Defence Mapping Agency (1982), the latter actually still being the most extensive collection of place names ever published so far.

Linguistic interpretation of place names – one of the main tasks of historical T. – has been proposed mostly for the northern areas: for Eritrea, cf., e.g., Conti Rossini's (1938), which can be considered a small, yet unparalleled masterpiece in the genre, and then Ricci (1960, 2000), Franchini (1982–1983), Voigt (1999); for Beǧa place names, cf. Zaborski (1970) and Bechhaus-Gerst (2000); for Təgray cf. Tubiana (1956). The interpretation of Eritrean and northern Ethiopian place names has also played a role in the discussion of the "Ethiopian origins", since a connection with South Arabian place names clearly appears (CRStor 91–106; Marrassini 1985; 2003). Particular attention has received the name of Aksum, on which very different hypotheses have been advanced (cf. Tubiana 1958; Schneider 1994; Müller 1998), even though it will be difficult to deny any connection with the Gəᶜəz root ksm* as suggested by Ricci (in Schneider 1994: 188ff.; s. also Kropp 2010). Adulis has also been early discussed (cf. Praetorius 1893). Much less has been done for central and southern Ethiopia (cf. Cerulli 1971; Tubiana 1958; 1987; Little 1978).

Transcription systems

This entry presents an overview of systems used for the transcription of languages used in Ethiopia and Eritrea. It does not aim at completeness but rather is meant to assist the users of the EAE and other publications in the field to understand the motivations behind the choice of a certain system. Naturally, every transcription system has only access to a limited pool of characters and diacritics, be that due to technology (typewriter, ASCII) or due to economy.

Transcription of Epigraphic South Arabian

The transcription of ↗Epigraphic South Arabian (ESA) orientates itself very strongly towards Arabic. This becomes obvious in the treatment of the voiceless emphatic interdental (proto-Semitic ṯ̣*), which converged in Hebrew and Ethiopic (↗Ethio-Semitic) with the voiceless emphatic sibilant (ጸ ṣ). The traditional representation ẓ of this sound in Modern ↗Arabic does not reflect the phonetic reality, since the reflex of proto-Semitic ṯ̣* is in Arabic Bedouin dialectsḏ̣* and in sedentary dialects ḍ. The pronunciation ẓ occurs in loans from the literary language.

The voiceless emphatic lateral ṣ́, which in Hebrew, e.g., has converged with the voiceless emphatic sibilant ṣ, has been preserved in ESA and Classical Ethiopic (↗Gəᶜəz) as ṣ́ (ፀ ṣ́ä ṣ́äḥay). In Modern Arabic this sound has developed into a voiced emphatic dental (ḍ). This transcription is simply not feasible for Epigraphic South-Arabian. Instead of the Arabicising ḍ, the EAE uses the more exact ṣ́. Within Ethiopic laterality (marked by ´) is abandoned and thus ፀ ṣ́ coincides in modern languages with ጸ ṣ in [ᵗs’].

The traditional Arabicising transcription š́ (so in Leslau) of the voiceless non-emphatic lateral ሠ

ś has been given up in favour of ś. Therefore ṣ:ṣ́ relate to each other in terms of laterality like s:ś.

*ṯ̣	ظ ẓ	ẓ (better ṯ̣)	–	–
*ṣ́	ض ḍ	ḍ (better ṣ́)	ፀ ḍ	ṣ́
*ś	ش š	s^2, š, ś	ሠ š	ś

ESA is particularly important for the reconstruction of sibilants since it is only here that we find an extra sibilant compared to Arabic. The s of Arabic and Classical Ethiopic is the result of the merger of proto-Semitic and ESA s^1 and s^3, due to the loss of affrication in s^3, i.e. *$^t s$ > s. In a further development Classical Ethiopic s and ś converged in modern Ethio-Semitic because of the loss of laterality.

In Sabaic studies one encounters a confusing multitude of transcriptions, all of which cannot be reproduced here. This may serve as an example: š is used for s^1, because this sound corresponds to š in Hebrew, but also for s^2, because this sound is š in Arabic.

Because of the persistent discussion concerning these phonemes the transcription $s^{1–3}$ is recommended. s^1 can be simplified to be written s as e.g. in sbʾ for s^1*bʾ* 'Saba'.

Transcription of Ethiopian languages

The early grammars of Gə^{c}əz, ↗Amharic and ↗Təgrəñña do not usually offer any transcriptions due to the transliteration difficulties of the Ethiopic alphabet, only providing some words in Ethiopic ↗script, cf. for example Ludolf (1698; 1699; ^{2}1702), Praetorius (1871; 1879; 1886) as well as Dillmann (1857; ^{2}1899; DillmLex). Similarly absent are transcriptions even in more recent works such as Goldenberg (1966) and Kapeliuk (1988).

In works of a later date a transcription is usually added as in parts of Gebre Jesus Afevork (1905) and Guidi (1952; but not 1940), Armbruster (1908), Cohen (1936). But on the other hand works do exist that only offer the language in transcription, e.g., Leslau (1941; LesCDic), Voigt (1977), Weninger (2001).

However the situation is different concerning the presentation of hitherto unwritten languages. In the early transcriptions the recorders tried to portray the sounds they heard from the mouths of the indigenous people of the Horn of Africa in an impressionistic fashion.

When recording, e.g., Təgrəñña at the end of the 18th/beginning of the 19th cent., as documented by Adelung – Vater (1812: 120f.), a short vowel was indicated by doubling the following consonant (as in "Middrih", i.e. mədri 'earth', a convention adopted from German orthography), a voiceless s was shown by "sz" (e.g., "Szebbéy", i.e. säbʾay 'man'), and č̣ was transcribed with "kj" (e.g., "Affinkjáha", i.e. ʾafənč̣a-ḵa 'nose' (sc.: 'your nose'); č can be transcribed with "tj" (s. below).

When presenting Amharic a mechanical transliteration was often used orienting itself on written texts (ʾ of the first order = ä; nĕ also for n), e.g. "Äbatatjĕnĕ", i.e. abbatačč̌ən 'Our father' (Adelung – Vater 1812: 113).

In other cases people either did not hear the phonetic differences or did not want to hear them, because on the whole speakers rarely ventured outside the sound system of their mother tongue. Thus no distinction was made between the glottal stop and ^{c}, or between glottalized and non-glottalized sounds. At times even vowel length was ignored.

With the Standard Alphabet by Carl Richard Lepsius (1855, improved 1863) and the numerous works by Leo Reinisch, who composed grammars and dictionaries for 13 East African languages (↗^{c}Afar, Barea [↗Nara], Beḍauye [↗Beğa], ↗Bilin, Chamir [Ḫamta], Dschäbärti-Somali [↗Somali], Irob-Saho [↗Irob], Kafa [↗Käfiččo], ↗Kunama, Nuba, Quara [↗Agäw], Saho [↗Sāho] and Somali, which were published between 1873 and 1911), linguists now had a fully developed and proven transcription system at their disposal, which since has undergone only minor changes.

Most changes that have been introduced since the days of Lepsius and Reinisch up to the International Phonetic Alphabet (IPA) system are only of a stylistic nature without achieving any greater phonetic precision, e.g. š > ʃ, ž > ʒ, ṅ > ŋ, ñ > ɲ, ' > ʔ, ḥ > ħ. Only in a few cases can one speak of a true improvement. As is obvious, the representation of the spirant sound ḵ (x, χ) with ḫ^{c} or kh makes little sense.

Because of the large Italian contribution to the linguistic literature of the ↗Orbis Aethiopicus I include for comparison the Italian consonantal transcription system as manifested in the numerous works by Guidi and Conti Rossini. The transcription system of the EAE follows closely with few exceptions, taking up the system used by Leslau. In more recent issues of the JES a transcription is suggested for the emphatic (glottalised) phonemes, where glottalisation is to be marked by a following apostrophe (or gravis) as in the IPA. This system is used in some more recent publications.

In the table below, Lepsius's transcription is the one advocated in his work of 1863 (in brackets that of 1855).

It is evident that there is great continuity in the representation of consonants. Lepsius's suggestion to mark labialisation by a dot above the basic sign was not taken up after him. Even though marking with superscript ^{w} offers more information, the disadvantage is that putting ^{w} after the consonant does not reflect the phonetic reality. This diacritic ought to – just as with Lepsius – be placed above the basic sign. Similarly the diphthongal ţ of the Romanian orthography has found few friends. But marking glottalisation with an apostrophe, as in t' (= ṭ), has recently become very popular.

Marking the spirantisation of b, which is sadly entirely ignored in the newer transcriptions, is achieved by Guidi either very rarely or it is shown somewhat awkwardly with bh e.g. kĕbhū́r. Conti Rossini (1940) indicates the Təgrəñña spirantisation of b, k and q occasionally in the form of bh, kh and q̇.

The important difference between the Italian school and the EAE concerns the vowels. First, the traditional opposition between a : ā is now shown as ä : a. In this case marking the length is more beholden to the phonetic reality (v. the transcription in Klingenheben 1966). This is in contrast with Leslau's categorical judgment (1995: 33): "The Amharic vowels are short". It is also useful to mark the long vowel ē, which takes the palatalisation of the preceding consonant into account, e.g. B^{e}lāttiēnā.

An advantage of the old transcription is that the a that follows laryngeals አ/ዐ and ሀ/ሐ/ኀ is not marked as a long vowel, because it is a vowel of the first order, as in (ᵓ)akāl 'body' and har 'silk'. The opposition between short and long a-vowel after non-laryngeal (e.g., ba : bā, now rendered as bä : ba) applies to post-laryngeal vowels as well, e.g., ḫams ('five [fem.]') vs. ḫāməs ('fifth [masc.]'), both given as ḫa in EAE. Contrary to the opposition of the first and the fourth orders bä : ba, in a laryngeal context the transcription ḫa (< ḫä) = ḫa (< ḫā) does not clearly explain this difference.

A further advantage lies in the marking of the position of the stress, now abandoned, e.g., šammā́, aggā́ri, although in many cases the last ā-vowel bears the stress (but cf. qalṭā́ffā) and many forms that have not been transcribed.

The biggest difference is found in the notation of the two central vowels, which are not rendered as nowadays phonemically but phonetically. In the old Italian system, the high central vowel is indicated with e, ^{e}, ĕ, ĭ, ŭ, e.g. dĕngĕl, tĭnnĭš, 'ĕnnĭ́st, guendĭl, šĕkĭrkĕrit, berŭndó and the low central vowel with a, ⱥ, å, e.g. dⱥ́ndⱥs, dⱥ́nbi, sⱥ́ffi, zanⱥggā, anṣabārā́qi, guǻlbā́č. Since no phonetics of Amharic has been published so far, there is no way of checking this data. Similarly there is no comprehensive explanatory publication from the Italian side. It seems however plausible to assume that the velar [ŋg] in dĕngĕl 'virgin' triggers the lower allophonic pronunciation of the high central vowel and that the post-alveolar š in tĭnnĭš triggers a frontal (palatal) allophone of the high central vowel. Word-initially and in a pre-tonic position, if this is of relevance, this central vowel seems to be more likely to have a lower articulation. The transcription of the personal prefix of the 3rd pers. masc. sg. and 3rd pers. pl. ī- (as in īnnággⱥrā́ll, Guidi ^{3}1924: 38) portrays the real pronunciation to a greater degree than the phonetic pronunciation [jɘ] or [jɨ] of the phonemically notated /yə/. Also in the vicinity of labials the notation kŭfú 'bad' is exemplary. Ricci (1995) adds to the phonetic realisations of /ə/ the form ă, e.g. brăhắn (= bərhan).

Here is a table showing the different transcriptions of the vowels:

	Lepsius	Reinisch	Ital. school	EAE	JES
	ā	ā	ā	a	a
	ē	ē	ē	e	é
	ī	i, ī	i	i	i
	ō	ō	o	o	o
	ū	ū	u	u	u
Central vowels	e̥	e, i, o̱, u̱	ᵉ, ĕ, ĭ, ŭ	ə	ɨ
	a	a	a, a̵, å	ä (a after laryngeals)	ä

In today's transcription, which is based on the works by Leslau, sounds are written purely phonemically, i.e. concerning the central vowels a distinction is only made between ə and ä. A practical consequence of such a simplified transcription is an increasingly bad pronunciation of Amharic, where e.g. the palatal (ĭ) and velar (ŭ) allophonic realisation of /ə/ as well as the rounding of /ä/ are disregarded. However, for a correct pronunciation compliance with stress, vowel length and the spirantisation of b after a vowel (and occasionally after a consonant) is essential.

Some symbols have been displaced in the course of time like indicating shortness (or centralisation respectively) by the lower segment of a circle, known as the breve (ĭ, ŭ). The symbol a̵, which was previously commonly used for the low central vowel, has now been replaced by ä (with the trema indicating centralisation). The dash in a̵ is however contained in today's phonetic symbols for the two high central vowels ɨ and ʉ; here a̵ would have fitted in well. These deliberations are fully justified for a narrow and consistent phonetic transcription; however, they are of no import at all for a phonemic transcription. There the aim must be to unambiguously identify and pay attention to oppositions. As long as there is no opposition between e and ɛ or t and th there is no need in a phonemic transcription to indicate the degree of opening or aspiration respectively. It is justifiable to mark these distinctions as well, if the target is to attain a better pronunciation. However, this will not be achieved by replacing the traditional symbols one by one with "more modern" symbols.

It would be desirable, if in a transcription of Amharic – at least in works dedicated to Amharic – for once more consideration is given to the phonetic side of language.

More recent transcription systems

It seems that in some more recent transcription systems the authors are less interested in the phonetic realisations but rather in a superficial phoneticisation of a phonemic transcription. The more recent transcriptions differ in the following points from the transcription used in the EAE and in most recent works in Ethiopian linguistics, especially those by Leslau.

a) Glottalised sounds are marked by an apostrophe, a diacritic that represents the glottal stop in the IPA system.

p̣	p'	č̣	č'
ṭ	t'	q (ḳ)	k'
ṣ	s'

The advantage of the traditional transcription consists in having the dot under the consonantal symbol (for this reason ḳ is preferable to q) as a marker of an emphatic pronunciation. This is a phonemic marking, the phonetic interpretation is left to the individual Semitic languages as to whether glottalisation, velarisation or pharyngalisation or any other realisations are applicable. Because of these many realisational possibilities, which must of course be stated for each individual language, a broad phonemic transcription is most suitable. This is the general principle for choosing a certain transcription. As long as there is no phonemic distinction between e.g. an open or a closed o or between a more or less rounded (open) ɔ, hardly any other symbol but o will be used in a normal transcription.

b) The affricates, for which the IPA has no special symbol, are portrayed by their constituent parts, as is the case in the Stardard Alphabet.

č	tʃ or ʧ
č̣	tʃ' or ʧ'
ǧ	dʒ or ʤ

These symbols may be acceptable for the description of recently recorded languages, whose phonemic system is not yet fully analysed, but it is less acceptable for languages or language groups that use affricates frequently and where they are phonemic, nor for languages that have affricates and glottal stop. Then these transcriptions become preposterous when the rendering of geminates is attempted; the representation ʧʧ for čč no longer corresponds with phonetic reality, because although the phoneme is repeated the sound sequence is not.

c) The two central vowels are rendered by other symbols:

‘traditional’	‘modern’
ə	ɨ
ä	ə, ɜ

The high central vowel is written ɨ, because of the belief it is articulated at the height of i (and u). But this is not the case as shown in the works by Sumner (1957), Bender (1969) and Devens (in SegBodLes). Though the traditional ə, when defined as a phonetic symbol, has a place of articulation that is too low, I see no advantage in replacing a commonly used symbol by another that is phonetically even less precise. Also bear in mind that a vowel’s place of articulation is not narrowly fixed to one point, and it would constitute some progress, if more were said about the phonetic realisation in different contexts. A superficial replacement of one symbol by another does not mean any improvement.

This is also the case concerning the use of ə instead of the ä for the low central vowel. The use of ə “traditional” for the high central vowel as well as “modern” for the low central vowel is confusing for every scholar of matters Ethiopic. The symbol ä is preferable because it contains a trema, which according to the IPA indicates centralisation. Consequently the symbol ë (so already in Westermann – Ward 1966: 40) would be well suited for the notation of the higher central vowel, just as ï (following Appleyard) would be.

Another tendency, which goes contrary to the principle one phoneme = one symbol, is the introduction of English spelling habits (sh, ny, kh), even in languages in which s, h, y, and k occur as phonemes – this constitutes a turning back to transcriptional practices of the early 19th cent.

Great progress has been achieved in recording languages by marking tones. Contrary to the marking of stress, which seems to have steadily decreased, tonal analysis of the ↗Cushitic, ↗Omotic and ↗Nilo-Saharan languages has made enormous progress. Let me only mention Kunama, whose tonal system is only now beginning to be understood.

Treaties and conventions

Introduction

A T. is defined, in modern international law, as a formalized agreement between two actors in international law. These parties can be either independent states or recognized international organization. Other terms for T. are agreement (or international agreement), pact, protocol, or convention (in Ethiopia/Eritrea the terms are: (Amh. ውል, wəl; ስምም(ነት) səməmm(ənnät), Tgn.: ስምምዕ səməmə^{c} [‘treaty’, more formal], also ውዕሊ wə^{c}li or ውዕል wə^{c}əl [‘agreement’]). T. contain regulations either ensuring the status quo ante or creating a new relationship. Like ↗contracts, T. express obligations assumed by the parties of the T.; if a party fails to fulfil those obligations it can be held liable under international law. T. can be bilateral and multilateral.

Typically, T. covered diverging interests, mostly peace agreements, the creation of military or commercial alliances, or of respective confederacy, the de jure recognition of each other’s spheres of influence or territories etc.

By extension, the term T. can be also applied to pre-modern agreements between two or more political entities, in particular those transmitted in written form. T. feature most prominently in Antiquity (cp., e.g., the Graeco–Persian Peace of Callias of ca. 450 B.C., the Thirty-Years’ Peace signed between Athens and Sparta in 446 B.C., or the T. between Rome and Sassanian ↗Iran in the 3rd cent. A.D.). In the context of Northeast Africa, an example can be found as early as ca. 1258 B.C., with the Egyptian-Hittite peace T., signed between pharaoh Ramses II and king Hattusli II (or “III”; s. Breyer 2010: 227–47; Klengel 2002). Another famous T. in the ancient Northeast Africa was the Baqt, signed between the Christian state of Makuria (↗Nubia) and the Muslim rulers of ↗Egypt in 651 A.D.

In consideration of the customary ↗law, the term T. can be further extended to include orally transmitted agreements, including those between autonomous ethnic groups (↗inter-ethnic clan relations). For example, an oral peace agreement was allegedly concluded between the Sultanate of ↗Awsa and aṣe ↗Mənilək II in 1896; a military pact was agreed between the Leemo ↗Hadiyya and ↗Ǝndägañ before their incorporation into Ethiopia (Bustorf 2002, chs. 5–6). Mutual agreements between nomadic groups concerning the security of trade routes and either agreements on non-interference or the levying of taxes and ↗tributes can be mentioned in this context (cp. ↗Beǧa).

This article focuses on the modern definition of T. as an agreement endorsed in writing by at least two relatively autonomous parties. For land use agreements between emperors and subordinate lords (the most prominent form of contract in the “medieval” times, excluded here) see ↗g^{w}əlt, ↗land tenure. For an overview of international agreements focusing on territorial delimitations see also ↗boundaries. The complex problem of possible contrasts between modern international law as it is expressed in the T. and the traditional customary law and land use is left out of the scope of the entry.

Local T. of the Zämänä mäsafənt

With regard to Ethiopia’s T. history, the point of departure of the T. is the era of the ↗Zämänä mäsafənt. At the time when governors and princes aspired to create their own quasi-independent territories formalized agreements between these dominions became increasingly necessary. The degree of autonomy of the territorial units may justify the use of term T. in this context. While it may be assumed that most such agreements were concluded in writing, very few documents have survived. A letter (scroll) written in an unknown script and an accompanying Arabic explanation by an Oromo prince of ↗Limmuu, Sanna Abbaa Rago (son of ↗Abbaa Bagibo I) and sent, ca. 1839, to the ruler of Goǧǧam, däǧǧazmač ↗Goššu Zäwde (RubActa I, 40f.), contains passages typical for a “T. of friendship”, such as: “I ask you to have affection for me and I shall have affection for you”. In addition, the protection of travellers, the exchange of goods and eventually Sanna’s marriage to Goššu’s daughter are discussed. No evidence exists, however, that Goššu endorsed the conditions, and thus this letter can be hardly viewed as a T.

An example of an alliance between leaders within the Christian Ethiopian realm is the agreement concluded between ras ↗Mikaʾel “Səḥul” and the Ethiopian ruler, as transmitted in a short chronicle (Kropp 1989: 70, 271). In order to underline its sacredness this alliance is termed ↗kidan and compared with the pact between God and Noah and with that between the first Solomonic ruler ↗Yəkunno Amlak and the saint ↗Täklä Haymanot (ibid.).

To some extent, the ↗Constitution of 1931 also follows the older pattern of T. between princes. Ras ↗Kaśa Ḫaylu of Šäwa, ras ↗Śəyyum Mängäša of Təgray and ras ↗Ḫaylu Täklä Haymanot of Goǧǧam refused to sign it because of the stipulation that the dynasty should continue in the line of aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I. A compromise was only reached when Ḫaylä Śəllase assured them that the elevated status of their houses would never be contested.

International T. of the Zämänä mäsafənt

The first international T. were also concluded during the Zämänä mäsafənt, between the regional rulers and the European powers. The aims were usually trade opportunities, in particular the control over the trade routes in the ↗Red Sea.

Knowing of the interest of ↗France in the coastal regions, in the late 1850s ras ↗Nəguśe Wäldä Mikaʾel of Təgray and Səmen offered ceding coastal areas (not under his control) in exchange French protection (s. ↗Ǝmnätä Maryam). The T. was never ratified by France, as Nəguśe lost power shortly thereafter. Still, in the 1880s, France cherished the fiction that it was an internationally valid T.

On 11 May 1862, a T. was signed between France and the local rulers, negotiated by ↗Abū Bakr Ibrāhīm Šaḥīm, which ceded ↗Obock to France, the nucleus of ↗Djibouti.

The second major actor in the competition for the control of the Red Sea coast was the ↗United Kingdom. From 1855, British interests in the coastal region led to a variety of T. with Somali "coastal sultans" (cp. Prendergast Welsh 1932: 217), which also regulated ↗slavery (Miers 1975: 83; cp. also ↗Boundaries with Somalia). ↗Berbera became the principle station of the Egyptians (later of the ↗British Somaliland Protectorate); it was annexed by Egypt as early as 1867, followed by further annexations of Somali territories in northern Somalia. In a T. of 1877, Great Britain recognized these Egyptian possessions, and the Ottoman cabinet transferred the northern Somali coast to Egypt under Ottoman suzerainty in 1880 (Orhonlu 1974: 154f., 269f.). Throughout the colonial period the Somali region was marked by a high degree of continued consciousness of traditional independence, local legal systems remaining widely unchanged. This consciousness was also expressed through T., the most prominent being the Arabic T. of 1916/17 between Maḥammad ᶜAbdille Ḥasan (↗Muḥammad ᶜAbdullāh Ḥasan), the "amīr" of the Somali, perceived as a "rebel" by the British, and the ↗Ottoman Empire, represented by the Ottoman General of the Yemen, ᶜAlī Saᶜīd pasha in Lahagi. The T. regulated the formal incorporation of Somalia into the Ottoman Empire for protection against colonial troops (Hess 1964).

Britain and ↗Italy signed a contract over a strip of land, purchased by the ↗Rubattino Shipping Company in 1869/70, which laid the foundation of the ↗Colonia di Assab, starting point for all further Italian ambitions in the region. On 21 May 1883 a T. of friendship and commerce between Italy and nəguś ↗Mənilək of Šäwa was signed in ↗Ankobär to secure trade between Šäwa and ᶜAsäb. In addition, a T. of friendship with the sulṭān of the then independent sultanate of Awsa for free trade transit through his territory was concluded (cp. Darkwah 1975: 69f.; Rossetti 1910).

There are also examples of early T. with rulers of the Ethiopian interior, such as the British-Ethiopian T. of friendship between ↗Ali Alula and William Cornwallis ↗Harris in 1849, which in fact was not a T. concluded with Ethiopia, but with a regional lord controlling only the centre.

Later T. with local rulers, also usually involving "commerce and friendship", had additional protocols on slavery and its abolition (Darkwah 1975: 170f.). These were mostly without effect, and especially the British endeavours never led to a significant decrease in the slave trade.

The validity of such T. was not questioned by the foreign powers, with whose help the local rulers hoped to extend their fiefdoms. A notable example is, among others, Kaśa of Təgray (the future ↗Yoḥannəs IV), who agreed to non-interference to the passage through his territory of British-Indian troops during the Mäqdäla-campaign (↗Napier expedition), which led to the downfall of his enemy aṣe ↗Tewodros II. Much later ras ↗Alula Ǝngəda signed a T. of friendship with the Italians against Šäwa.

T. of the Ethiopian Empire in the 19th–20th centuries

After the unification of most of Christian Ethiopia by Tewodros II, various T. between imperial powers and Ethiopia were concluded. The reigns of Tewodros II and Yoḥannəs IV were short and it was aṣe Mənilək II who brought Ethiopia to equal footing with expanding European powers and, especially after the Battle of ↗ᶜAdwa, was able to conclude various formal T. with those emerging imperial powers.

The ↗Hewett T., signed on 3 June 1884 between Egypt, Britain and Ethiopia, was aṣe Yoḥannes IV's only international T. For the British it was at that time a disengagement enterprise. They mobilised the Ethiopians to fight the Mahdīya while the Italians, from the London point of view, filled the vacuum created after the Egyptian retreat in order to prevent a French domination at the Red Sea (cf. Rubenson 1966:226).

T. often entailed linguistic problems. When the ᶜAfar chiefs of ↗Raḥayta and ↗Tağūra ceded their territory to the French in the 19th cent., the T. was written in French and Arabic. In these languages, it clearly spelled out cession of territory. However, there is no such term in the ᶜAfar language, the corresponding word lumo meaning the right to use the land. Such (mis)interpretation potential did not affect their validity from the European point of view. The most prominent example is the ↗Italo–Ethiopian Convention of 1889, the so called T. of ↗Wəčale, in which article 17 reads as if Ethiopia was a quasi-protectorate of Italy; this led to the Battle of ᶜAdwa of 1896 (Elliesie 2008).

Less than two years after the Ethiopian victory, all the European powers had signed T. with Ethiopia, recognizing her independence, and stimulating commerce and trade.

Mənilək II used T. to counterbalance the increasing economic and territorial interests of the various powers, and their claims on Ethiopia. An important example is the Ethiopian-French Convention of 29 January 1896 negotiated by ↗Lagarde, making Djibouti Ethiopia's main outlet to the sea and, in return, ending French claims for the colony's hinterland. The Emperor reciprocated by signing an agreement to contain British influence in the Nile valley, which was Britain's main interest. Following the negotiations with the French, Britain sent the Rodd Mission to Ethiopia, to sign border-agreements with Ethiopia and the Anglo–Ethiopian settlement of 14 May 1897.

Despite the fact that Ethiopia had actively protected her independence through international T., the powers continued to pursue their economic interests with her in a most paternalistic way. This became obvious in the ↗Tripartite agreement of 1906 (Keefer 1981; Marcus 1964), which is a T. on Ethiopia without Ethiopia being a signatory (cp. also the secret T., Schwarz 1937:41). Between the victory of ᶜAdwa and World War I, Ethiopia signed numerous T. of friendship with other powers such as the United States (cp. ↗Skinner Mission), as well as Italy (↗Addis Ababa Treaty of 1896 [s. EAE vol. 5], the Italian–Ethiopian Treaty of Friendship and Arbitration of 1928), ↗France, ↗United Kingdom, ↗Austria, ↗Germany (T. of Friendship and Commerce of 1905, Friedrich ↗Rosen; for detailed lists s. Hertslett 1967; cp. Reischies 1937; Rossetti 1910). Further T. were concluded over specific questions, from postal services to the monopoly of Ethiopia over telegraphs (cp. the protest by ləǧ ↗Iyasu against the British violation of this T., Smidt in PICES 16).

While Ethiopia strengthened its independence and territorial sovereignty through T., several important T. on specific territories within Ethiopia were also concluded. The specific British interests in the Sudanese border areas, and Ethiopia's interest in having a commercial station linking it with the Sudan, motivated Mənilək II to conclude a "lease" T. relating to Itang on the ↗Baro River at the border, to be administered by the British. In this Anglo–Ethiopian T. of 15 May 1902, Art. IV permitted the British to establish a trading post on the frontier between the Sudan and Ethiopia on the Baro some 2,000 m long and not to exceed 4,000 acres. As Itang was found unsuitable for British settlement, the T. was instead applied on 8 October 1904 over ↗Gambella. It was administered by the Sudan Customs Department until Ethiopia unilaterally announced that it would take over the administration of the enclave on 30 October 1954. Thereafter a Sudanese–Ethiopian T. was concluded according to which Gambella was handed over to Ethiopia on 15 October 1956 (Birhanu Dibaba 1974; but cp. the disputed ↗Ilemi Triangle [s. EAE vol. 5], cp. also Mburu 2011). A comparable T. was concluded with the French on the ↗Chemin de fer franco-éthiopien, allowing French administration along the line. This subsequently led to the foundation of ↗Dərre Dawa within the French-administered strip of land. This assured that this line was closely connected with the colonial territory of Djibouti, which included the use of Djibouti ↗currency in that territory (until the 1950s).

After ↗World War II and the end of Italian colonialism in Ethiopia, a variety of T. have been concluded between western allies and Ethiopia, concerning her boundaries and sovereignty. Notable T. are the Anglo–Ethiopian Agreement of 1944, concerning Ethiopia's then restricted sovereignty under British control (↗United Kingdom). This was ended only in the 1950s when British-controlled territories in Somali (↗Ogaden) were handed back to Ethiopia. Further important border T. were the 1947 border agreement on the Kenyan border with Ethiopia or the Franco–Ethiopian Agreement of 1954, concerning the position of Lake Af^{c}ambo and the border with Djibouti (for details on the boundary T., s. Brownlie 1979).

Multilateral conventions

Starting from 1896 Ethiopia entered into the international concert of states in a Western sense, which immediately led to multilateral T. being signed, ratified, or both by accession; for example, Ethiopia entered into the Postal Union (↗Stamps) and signed T. with the International ↗Red Cross Society, Geneva. As an original founding member of the ↗United Nations in 1945, Ethiopia was one of the 51 signatories of UN-Charter and is also a founding member of the ↗Organisation of African Unity, meanwhile replaced by the African Union in 2002, hosting its headquarter in Addis Abäba. Subsequently Ethiopia became signatory to a number of different conventions, such as to the thematically relevant Vienna Convention of the Law of Treaties (signed 1970), the Geneva Conventions (signed 1969), the Genocide Convention (signed 1949), and a long series of multilateral T. created mostly within the framework of the UN (s., e.g., UN Depository Library 202 in Heidelberg, Germany, on file with the authors). It is, however, worth noting that Ethiopia does not rely on the 1949 Conventions. The T. excludes protections of political groups while Ethiopian domestic law on genocide and crimes against humanity contains a wider scope of application. It tries the accused, which criminalizes the destruction of groups on grounds of their political beliefs. Thus, unlike most other national penal laws the Ethiopian Penal Code of 1957 (↗Criminal codes) did not only adopt the major rules of the 1949 Convention eight years after ratification but was also used to charge Mängəśtu Ḫaylä Maryam and his co-accused, quite unique, beyond the scope of international law (Elliesie 2009: 40).

U

Ullendorff, Edward

U. (b. 25 January 1920, Berlin, d. 6 March 2011, Oxford) was a Semitist and leading British éthiopisant during the second half of the 20th cent. Though born in Berlin, U. often liked to recount that he was born in Zürich

U. received his M.A. in Semitic languages from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem in 1942, where he studied Ethiopian Semitic languages under Hans Jacob ↗Polotsky. His language skills led to various positions with the ↗British Military Administration in Eritrea and Ethiopia between 1942 and 1946, where he was also among the founding editors of the first Təgrəñña-language newspaper, the ↗Eritrean Weekly News.

After a short service in the Palestine Mandatory Government (1947–48), U. began his academic career in Oxford, tutoring Colonial Service cadets in Arabic. From Oxford he obtained his Ph.D. with a dissertation on the comparative phonology of Ethiopian Semitic (publ. 1955). In 1950 he was appointed Lecturer (and in 1956 Reader) in Semitic Languages at the University of St. Andrews. In 1959 he took up the Chair in Semitic Languages and Literatures at the University of Manchester. Finally, in 1964 he moved to the ↗School of Oriental and African Studies, taking the Chair in ↗Ethiopian Studies that had been specially created for him: the first Chair in Ethiopian Studies anywhere in the world. From 1979 until his retirement in 1982 U. held the Chair in Semitic Languages.

U.'s extensive œuvre includes over 600 works in the fields of both Ethiopian and Semitic studies, on philological and linguistic as well as non-linguistic themes. Major studies include the 1967 British Academy Schweich Lectures on Biblical Archaeology (published as UllBibl), and two jointly written works, The Ethiopic Book of Enoch (1978, with Knibb) and The Hebrew Letters of Prester John (1982, with Beckingham). During his time in London, the study and teaching of Ethiopian languages acquired a regular basis, aided by his chrestomathies for Amharic (1965) and Təgrəñña (1985). Also of particular note are his translation of the first volume of aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I's autobiography (HSLife I) and his general survey The Ethiopians … (1960), as well as his account of his early adult years in Palestine and in Eritrea and Ethiopia, The Two Zions … (1988).

Alongside Ethiopian Studies, U. was particularly interested in Hebrew of all periods and its Near Eastern background, publishing a number of studies on that language.

U.'s contribution to the academic sphere in the ↗United Kingdom also included an active membership in various scholarly bodies, most notably as vice-president of the British Academy (1980–82), as well as serving as chair of the editorial boards of the Journal of Semitic Studies (1959–64) and the Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies (1968–78).

In recognition of his scholarship U. was elected a Fellow of the British Academy in 1965; in 1960 he was granted the Imperial Ethiopian Gold Medallion and in 1972 the Haile Selassie International Prize for Ethiopian Studies; in 1998 he received the rare honour of being one of the few British scholars to be elected a foreign associate of the Italian Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei.

Verzeichnis der Orientalischen Handschriften in Deutschland

The monographic series, generally referred to as VOHD, has been published in Germany since 1961 by the Franz Steiner Verlag, Wiesbaden (from 1988/89 Stuttgart). It is the largest worldwide series of catalogues of Oriental ↗manuscripts, and the second largest, after the ↗Ethiopian Manuscript Microfilm Library, of Ethiopic manuscripts.

Catalogues have been an essential tool for scholars of Oriental studies in Germany since mid-19th cent. (see e.g., Heinrich von Ewald's catalogues of Tübingen manuscripts of 1844 and 1847 and ↗Dillmann's Berlin catalogue of 1878, as the earliest examples of Ethiopian manuscripts). While German libraries – in particular the ↗Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin, Preußischer Kulturbesitz, but also other institutions – continuously augmented their Oriental manuscript collections, few catalogue volumes were produced in the first half of the 20th cent. The vast majority of manuscripts thus remained uncatalogued and therefore to a large extent inaccessible to scholars.

The situation changed fundamentally when, in 1957, the Deutsche Morgenländische Gesellschaft (DMG, German Orientalist Society) proposed a new project, the Katalogisierung der Orientalischen Handschriften in Deutschland (KOHD, Union Catalogue of Oriental Manuscripts in German Collections). Funded by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG, German Research Foundation), the KOHD largely accepted for its VOHD series the cataloguing guidelines developed for cataloguing medieval (German) manuscripts, also funded by the DFG. In 1990 the project was taken over by the Göttingen Academy of Sciences and Humanities; since 1996 it has been also under the patronage of the Union Académique Internationale, Brussels. The head office remains at the Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin, the holder of the largest Oriental manuscript collection in Germany.

The first KOHD director was Wolfgang Voigt, of the Oriental Department of the Westdeutsche Bibliothek in Marburg (one of the successor institutions of the Preußische Staatsbibliothek). The first volume of the VOHD appeared as soon as 1961; it described Mongolian manuscripts and block prints. By the end of 2011, 143 volumes of descriptive catalogues and 52 supplementary volumes had appeared, covering various topics connected with Oriental manuscripts and their texts. The number of volumes devoted to a language or language group may vary considerably, ranging from just a single volume (e.g., Lao manuscripts) to multi-volume catalogues (e.g., Indian, Arabic, Tibetan, or Turkic language manuscripts).

Cataloguing (Christian) Ethiopic manuscripts became a work unit within KOHD on the initiative of Ernst ↗Hammerschmidt. The very first Ethiopia-related VOHD issue was a special volume on illuminated manuscripts he produced in collaboration with Otto Jäger (1968; VOHD XV). Hammerschmidt was the first to microfilm manuscripts in the field. For the first two proper descriptive catalogue volumes, he prepared a description of part of the manuscripts he had microfilmed in the monasteries of Lake ↗Ṭana (↗Kəbran Gäbrəᵓel and ↗Däbrä Maryam with ↗Rema = VOHD XX, 1 and 2, in 1973 and 1977, respectively; s. HamTana I, II). The description methodology as well as the editorial standards he introduced still prevail today. A third volume was finalized by Veronika Six (VOHD XX, 3, in 1999; s. SixTana III). Three more of the VOHD Ethiopic series (volumes VOHD XX, 4, 5 and 6, in 1983, 1989, 1994) describe manuscripts in German collections (s. HamSixBerl, SixBay, SixDeu). Single manuscripts purchased after 1994 have been regularly described in the journal Aethiopica, also by Six.

Ethiopic manuscripts in Arabic as well as ᶜağamī (in ↗Harari and ↗Səlṭe) manuscripts from the Schlobies and Wagner collections (Berlin-Brandenburg Academy of Sciences and Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin, respectively), were also described in one of the VOHD volumes edited by Ewald Wagner (VOHD XXIV, 2, in 1997; s. WagHand).

The VOHD also gives room for case studies, dedicated to one specific topic (e.g., text editions), and published in supplementary volumes. For the Ethiopian series the work by Six (1975) on the Vita of ↗Tadewos of Däbrä Maryam should be mentioned.

Vittori, Mariano

V. (also Vettori, Lat. Victorius, hence sometimes "Vittorio"; b. 1518, Rieti, d. 29 June 1572, Rieti) was a Catholic ecclesiastic and scholar with a keen interest in Greek and Hebrew as well as in Ethiopian studies. Born Mariano Amoretti, he had his family name changed to V. in memory of an uncle who was particularly supportive of his studies.

V. belonged to the circle of prelates from the Roman Curia who, within the framework of the so-called Catholic reformation and its renewed attention to Oriental languages, gathered around Petrus Aethiops (↗Täsfa Ṣəyon, s. EAE vol. 5) at ↗Santo Stefano dei Mori. Their aim was to learn the mysterious "Chaldaic" language – then a label for ↗Gəᶜəz – as a key to the most ancient phases of the biblical text. V. was introduced to that scholarly and intellectual milieu – which enjoyed the patronage of Pope Paul III (1534–49) and had strong ties with the philo-Protestant Italian (or better Paduan) followers of Erasmus of Rotterdam – by Cardinal Reginald Pole (d. 1558). The latter was a friend of Erasmus whom he had accompanied, as secretary, on diplomatic missions to Brussels in October 1553, Paris in 1553–54, and London in November 1554 (Sacchetti Sassetti 1917: 32f.). With Cardinal Pole and other important fellows from the Roman Curia, V. appears as a patron of the ↗Jacobite priest Moses of Mārdīn in an Arabic (ġaršūnī) colophon of the Latin Roman Missal in Syriac script copied by Moses himself on commission of Täsfa Ṣəyon (1548–49), now ms. BritLib Harley 5512, fol. 179r: "the priest Messer Mariano [Mâryânô], humble like Joseph son of Patriarch Jacob" (Levi Della Vida 1939: 142ff. and n. 5; cp. Wilkinson 2007: 68ff. and n. 23).

In 1556, Pole, whose financial means were always limited, recommended V. to Bishop Pierfrancesco Gagliano as his vicar in Pistoia, but apparently without success (Mayer 1996: 420 and n. 5; Id. 2000: 101 and n. 180). Gagliano had been a Savonarolan and a friend of the ecclesiastical reformer, Gasparo Contarini. It was probably through an appointment by Pole, however, that V. became a canon of Santa Maria in Cosmedin, the cardinal's titular church in Rome. Long after retiring to Viterbo as a protector of the "Spirituals" (an evangelical movement animated by Juan Valdés), Pole wrote an enthusiastic letter concerning V. to his friend and fellow "Spiritual" Cardinal Giovanni Morone (Sacchetti Sassetti 1917: 30 and 38f.). This letter may have helped V. find a place in Morone's household: in 1563, the cardinal requested V.'s participation, as both a theologian and "auditor" (the official who hears and examines the causes submitted to the pope), in the last sessions of the reconvened Council of Trent (ibid. 42f.; cp. Mayer 1996: 420 and n. 6). In 1571 V. was elected bishop of Amelia (today's province of Narni). On 9 June 1572 he was transferred to his native diocese of Rieti but he died the same month, just before taking possession of it – and, reportedly, becoming a cardinal himself.

V. authored several books on theology, canon law, liturgy, ethics and history: among them, a dissertation on the sacrament of confession, which appeared in 1562 and was reprinted in 1566; a catalogue of the archbishops of Canterbury followed by a life of St. Thomas More, posthumously edited by Gerhard Voss in 1604; an essay De antiquitatibus Italiae et Urbis Reatis ('On the antiquities of Italy and the town of Rieti') or De antiquitatibus Rheatae ('On the antiquities of Rieti'), undertaken in 1566, which was the first attempt at systematizing local history and tradition. Entrusted by Popes Pius IV and Pius V with the critical edition of the works by St. Jerome (from which he extracted the saint's Vita) and other Church fathers, he published his scholia to Jerome's Letters in 1556.

Yet V.'s most renowned work is the first ever grammar of the Gəᶜəz language, Chaldeae, seu Aethiopicae linguae institutiones ('Elements of Chaldaic, or Ethiopic language'), published in Rome, in 1552, and financed by Täsfa Ṣəyon. It was produced by the same printer, Valerio Dorico from Brixia (this time, opera Angeli de Oldradis, 'through the action of Angelo Oldradi', s. Barberi 1965: 237 and n. 26), and using the same font as Täsfa Ṣəyon's Testamentum Novum (1548–49), to the edition of which V. had contributed together with Pietro Paolo Gualtieri (s. the colophon of part [II], c. 225). The Institutiones were inspired by Gualtieri, who had called V.'s critical attention to the short sketch of "Chaldaic" grammar added, with a syllabarium, at the end of ↗Potken's Psalterium (cp. Lefevre 1966: 23f. and n. 22). V. completed the grammatical outline of Gəᶜəz with sections on the language of the "ancient Sabinians" (veterum Sabinorum), "used today by Ethiopians in some parts, and by Sabaeans and Nubians", and on Ethiopian ↗music, ↗numbers and reckoning. He dedicated this work to Cardinal Marcello Cervini (the future Pope Marcel II).

V.'s Institutiones obviously reflect the teaching of Täsfa Ṣəyon, who must also have provided information for the precious Libellus ('Booklet') on the kings of Ethiopia ab inundato terraru(m) orbe usq(ue) ad nostra te(m)pora ('from the Flood up to our times'), published as an appendix to the book (cc. [37]–[38] H.I–II), with a proper front page and important historical abstracts from the Vitae of "Lalibala" (↗Lalibäla) and "Imra" (i.e Yəmrəḥa/Yəmraḥ; ↗Yəmrəḥannä Krəstos). For the "catalogue" of the kings, the Libellus seems to depend upon the today's ms. Florence, Biblioteca Medicea Laurenziana Acq. e doni 38 (1530 A.D.), which includes a similar list "from ↗Arwe to ↗Ləbnä Dəngəl", fols. 139–43 (Marrassini 1988: 77, no. 13 [§viii]; s. already CRStor 12) – and was possibly related to Täsfa Ṣəyon and Santo Stefano dei Mori.

Neither the Libellus nor the section on music are found in the 1630 edition (the second and last one) of V.'s grammar, supervised by Achille Venerio, a canon of San Nicola in Carcere, for the ↗Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide. The Libellus alone was included in Andreas Schott's famous collection (1603) and Girolamo Vecchietti's treatise on chronology (1621; s. CRStor 11 and nn. 2–3), and eventually reproduced by Jules ↗Perruchon (1893: 368f.).

W

Wädağa

W. (ወዳጃ) is a collective ceremony of the ↗Oromo traditional religion whose content and form have acquired a clear Muslim character among Islamized Oromo. The name W. is also attributed to the rituals of the ↗possession cults in ↗Gondär and the ↗čat chewing sessions in ↗Wällo or elsewhere (e.g., Səlṭe).

The origin of the word W. is not entirely clear. Cerulli (1922: 136) connects it to the Somali wadaad (originally 'magician', then 'Islamic learned man'). Another etymology derives W. from the Oromo divine name Wadai (Azaïs – Chambard 1931: 109f.; da Thiene 1939: 328 'spirit of the W. ceremony') which is invoked by the participants of the ceremony. The word W. eventually entered Amharic (GuiVoc 592; KaneDic 1572) and Harari (Abdurahman Mähammäd Qorram 1991/92: 162).

At least four different types of ceremony are labelled W. in the sources: a traditional Oromo communal or family prayer; an Islamic collective but not canonical prayer; a session of the ↗zar cult; and a čat chewing ritual. Seemingly, the common denominator underlying all these different kinds of W. is the gathering of people in supplication of a deity or a powerful spirit.

A description of a traditional Oromo W. performed in the area of ↗Harär was provided by ↗Azaïs and ↗Chambard (1931: 109–15) on the basis of the data collected by ↗Jarosseau. The ceremony, which could be regional, local or simply familiar, was guided by a ministrant (rabsa) and two assistants (katabe and bule). Sacrifices, prayers and a communal meal were the main features of the W. (ibid. 109–12; s. also HuntGal 79f.). Cerulli translated and analysed five propitiatory songs chanted by the traditional Oromo faithful during the W. which he describes as a ceremony directed by the father of the family or an invited elder and consisting in the sacrifice of a sheep or, alternatively, in a "tufa (blessing by means of spitting) of beer or hydromel, followed by libations" (CerFolk 136–39).

In 1842 a W. of the Muslim Wällo Oromo was observed by ↗Isenberg and ↗Krapf (IsKrapf 323f.: wadācha) who describe it as a morning communal prayer (lasting on Wednesday and Friday until noon), apparently not much different from a ↗ḏikr. Some years later, the Chronicle of ↗Tewodros by ↗Zännäb (ZanLitTheod 19; MorTeod 161) mentions how šayḫ Yāsīn of Amora Gadal (↗Wärrä Himäno) organized a W. (W. yazä: in this context apparently a kind of ḏikr session with duʿāʾ, invocations to God) to hinder – to no avail – the coming of the king to his territory. Nowadays, at the pilgrimage site of ↗Faraqasa the main assembly held in praise and honour of ayyo ↗Momina (or Mumina, s. EAE vol. 5) is commonly called W. (Gemechu Jemal Geda 2007: 63f). It has been appropriately observed that the traditional W. easily acquired a Muslim character (TrIslam 274) and could thus have become one of the most powerful catalysts of the process of Islamization among the Oromo.

W. in the meaning of exorcism sessions of the zar cult in the Gondär region is mentioned by ↗Rodinson (1967: 64 [and n. 5 with further bibliography], 123). One could surmise that the word W. was originally used by Christian Amhara to refer derogatorily to a ceremony perceived as alien and unorthodox, and the meaning was then transferred to the zar sessions.

W. čat chewing sessions are essential parts of the ritual in both the Muslim W. and the zar cult W., while they are not attested in the traditional Oromo W. Hussein Ahmed (2010) describes in detail the different types of W. čat ceremonies among the Wällo Muslims and also points out the changes which they have undergone lately: in particular, after ↗World War II, W., originally a ritual of devotion, worship and supplication, slowly evolved towards a mere gathering of acquaintances and friends with scant or no religious connotation.

Wädağğe

Ras W. (ወዳጄ, also ወዳጆ, Wädağo; d. 5 November 1759) was a military officer and governor of several provinces during the reigns of aṣe ↗Bäkaffa, aṣe ↗Iyasu II and aṣe ↗Iyoʾas. He was son of wäläqa nägaš Abrako (GuiIyas 76 [text]), a descendant of ras ↗Yämanä Krəstos (ibid.; BlunChr 71).

W. succeeded his father as the governor of ↗Wäläqa during the reign of Bäkaffa. In December 1726 he is mentioned as one of the nobles presenting the king with the rich booty collected during one of his raids (GuiIohan 319 [text]). In October 1730, just as W. had defeated the rebel Yabbo Barya, he was asked to join the army of däğğazmač Qäññ, blattengeta Dawit, qäññazmač Ṗeṭros and šaläqa Wäräñña, sent byMəntəwwab (↗Bərhan Mogäsa) to quell the revolt headed by a certain Biyadgo Yoḥannəs (GuiIyas 35 [text]). On 9 November, Iyasu and Məntəwwab thanked W. by granting him a ↗lämd and fire-arms (ibid. 38).

W.'s repressive measures were once again required by the court during the insurgence of ↗Wägära, which continued even after ↗Tänśe Mammo's arrest and execution (ibid. 76f.). In the ensuing punitive expedition of February 1733, W. was supported by such prominent members of the military nobility as däğğazmač Abulidəs, bašša ↗Wänd Bäwäsän, bağərond Dägago of Səmen and others. However, it was W. who was responsible for the victorious military strategy and for the defeat of the rebel Wäfa Nabute and his followers (ibid. 78f.).

Still in 1733, W. was appointed däğğazmač (governor) of ↗Amhara (s. EAE vol. 5), which he governed with a strong hand quelling numerous internal mutinies and keeping the ↗Oromo in check (GuiIyas 76, 81 [text]). However, his expedition alongside ras ↗Wäldä Ləʾul against the disobedient märəd azmač ↗Abbəyye was unsuccessful; W. and Wäldä Ləʾul were defeated at Ayne in Karrayyu (AWTarik 42 [text]).

In late 1739, a conflict arose between W. and däğğazmač Ayo of ↗Bägemdər. When the Emperor offered däğğazmač Geta the governorship of the province and Ayo offered military resistance, W., himself aspiring to obtain control of Bägemdər, lent support to Geta (GuiIyas 105ff.). In January 1740, Ayo was defeated, and in July 1740 W. became governor of Bägemdər; Geta was placed over Səmen (ibid. 108). Three years later, in July 1743, the domains were redistributed: Geta became ṭəqaqən blatten geta, the governorship of Bägemdər was given to bašša (later qäññazmač) Mammo, and W. received that of ↗Goğğam. He did not keep the office for long: in January 1744, the Goğğame nobles (Habt Bäwäsän, Ǝnqo Ḥawaryat) and ecclesiastics rose against him. While W. succeeded in quelling the revolt, he had to leave the office to grazmač Č̣ole (ibid. 112f.). In August 1745, W. once again became the governor of Amhara (ibid. 117).

In March–April 1746, W. was among Iyasu's leading officers in an expedition to the northern provinces, with fights taking place along the rivers Gaba, ↗Atbara and ↗Täkkäze (ibid. 125f.). In June 1748, he was at the royal court, bringing his booty from a successful incursion against the Oromo (ibid. 143). In September of the same year he was made ṭəqaqən blatten geta and given the provinces of Gänğ and Yäwädi, while the governorship of Amhara passed to däğğazmač Boru (ibid. 144). In September 1749, W. additionally received the governorship of ↗Agäw (with Amhara being passed to Ǝnda Ləbbu; ibid. 148). Only two years later, in September 1751, he was again made governor of Amhara (Agäw was taken over by näggadras ↗Giyorgis; ibid. 154).

W. fought alongside his sovereign in numerous other expeditions (e.g., in March 1753, ibid. 161). He was among the first nobles whom Məntəwwab notified of her son's death on 26 June 1755 (ibid. 165f.). In September 1755, W. attempted to convince the queen that she should appoint him instead of Ayo over Bägemdər, but this was refused and he was sent back to Amhara (ibid. 175f.), where his governorship was confirmed on 1 October 1756 (ibid. 183).

In late 1758–early 1759, a feud arose between W. and däğğazmač Awsabyos of Goğğam (ibid. 190). The first clash ended in W.'s favour, but in the subsequent battle he was defeated. Subsequently, W. was removed from office; the governorship of Amhara went to däğğazmač Dulo (or Duri; ibid. 192). On 21 October 1759, shortly before his death, W. was given the province of Yəbaba with the title azzaž (ibid. 193). W. was buried in the royal compound of ↗Qʷəsqʷam. His military fame survived long after him (cp. BlunChr 10 [text]).

W.'s son ras ↗Goššu was one of the main protagonists of the early ↗Zämänä mäsafənt. W. also had a daughter, wäyzäro Bəččaš, from his liaison with wäyzäro Suranteya of Ambassal (BlunChr 71).

W. should not be confused with his namesake Wädağo or Wädağğe Abäddäb of Goğğam, who was prominent during the reign of aṣe ↗Susənyos.

Wäg

W. (ወግ 'tradition, custom') is a term appearing in different Ethiopian languages in the context of ↗customary ↗law, tradition and lore. It also serves as a basic principle in the Mäṣḥafä ↗śərᶜatä mängəśt, or Nägärä wäg. The semantic core of W. and other words linguistically linked to it, however, seems to point at 'orally transmitted knowledge'.

W. as attested in later Gəᶜəz texts, e.g., in the Mäṣḥafä śərᶜatä mängəśt, is to be considered a loanword from Amh., while on etymological grounds wägᶜ would be expected, cf. Tgn. wägᶜi 'custom, story', Tgr. wägᶜa 'converse'; Tgn. wägᶜayna, bäᶜal wägᶜi; 'riddle', 'story', 'song', 'chant', 'song in honour of the heroes or ancestors' (Leslau 1979: 646). Also Gəᶜəz wägᶜa 'talk, narrate', ʾawgəᶜa 'to follow the custom', wägᶜ 'narrative', 'tradition', 'custom', 'ceremonial' (LesCDic 608 on the basis of later traditional lexicography, not attested in ancient texts, rare, and not in DillmLex) are probably later formations.

In Amh. W. designates 'etiquette, usage(s) or traditional customs' which have largely lost their meaning, (kissing of a person's feet to indicate respect) but which are still observed; right sanctioned by custom, e.g., the headman's right to the tongue of a butchered heifer; the share from a ↗täzkar given to the vicars of the church, usually a dabbo (↗bread) and a crock of ↗ṭälla; wäg awägga 'to tell a story'; wäg awaqi 'one who knows all the traditions [elder, traditional teacher]', täwägga 'to be related, told; to haggle, dicker over the price', awägga 'to talk, converse, to narrate, tell stories, to chat'; balä wäg 'person who knows local custom and usage', 'one who is versed in the court protocol', 'person who has certain privileges, to a share in the täzkar-memorial feast, etc.', 'one who tells interesting stories', 'one who makes or establishes rules', 'dignitary', 'man of rank', 'peer', wägäñña 'one who is well-versed in the court etiquette', 'well-born', 'one who praises old customs and pretends to know them as though he had lived in those days', 'boaster', 'braggart', 'one who has a well-furnished, well-ordered house', 'storyteller', 'one who loves to talk', […] 'one who carries out corporal punishments at court', 'goldsmith', 'metalsmith', 'potter', 'tanner'; awgi 'one who tills tales, narrates, talks' (KaneDic 1576f., cp. also 1580).

Tgn. has täwäğᶜe 'to be discussed, to be transacted, to spread, be disseminated (news)', awwağəᶜe 'to cause to spread news', awğəᶜe 'to tell, disseminate, spread news', wäğaᶜ 'talkative', wäğᶜa 'matter, affair, business', mäwwağəᶜi 'telltale, one who cannot keep secrets' məwğaᶜ 'discussing, spreading secrets, news' (KaneTDic 1796).

Among the ↗Gurage (↗Čaha) W. designates 'custom' but also 'old man from whom one seeks advice in case of misfortune' or 'wise man' (also wäg awaqi) and an 'agent of the deity ↗Waq' (Leslau 1979: 646). In the ↗Səlṭi language the term wägagaññe, 'traditional supreme judge' or 'expert in traditional law and customs' derives from W. (Gutt – Hussein Mohammed 1997: 672). Both W. or wäg awaqi and wägagaññe may serve as diviners and interpreters of omens (↗Oracles and divination).

Derivates of the term W. can also be recognized, probably as loanwords, in non-Semitic languages, such as ↗Gamo woga 'law, tradition' or 'the right way to behave' (Freeman 2002: ix), ↗Gofa woga '[traditional] law, judgement, sentence' (Klausberger 1981: 23, 57). Woga appears in the ↗Oyda language, in turn, as a loanword from ↗Wälaytta or Gofa. Among the Oyda and ↗Galila the term kat woga 'royal law' regulates the behaviour towards the kati ('king'), the kati's clan and his belongings. It is basically an oral catalogue of forfeits and punishments, and is decided upon by the royal court (Klausberger 1981: 95, 102, 112, 115, 119, 148f., 154, 195f.; ↗Kingship, divine).

Wäldä Tənśaᵓe

Əččäge W.T. (ወልደ ፡ ትንሣኤ; fl. ca. 1855–67, Gašala) was the 50th əččäge of ↗Däbrä Libanos in Šäwa.

Information about W.T. is scarce. He was a native of Gašala, a locality in ↗Qʷara, and thus a compatriot of aṣe ↗Tewodros II. W.T. became a monk in the monastery of Nabäga in Fogära. Soon after the coronation, i.e. after 1855, aṣe Tewodros II appointed him to the office of əččäge to replace ↗Wäldä Maryam (CerDLib III, 162). W.T. apparently kept the position for most of Tewodros's reign. He was succeeded by Gäbrä Iyäsus in 1867.

A dubious account told by a monk from Däbrä Libanos to Antonio ↗Cecchi reports that abunä ↗Sälama and W.T. gave the order to destroy Däbrä Libanos and to kill over 300 monks; in ↗Azäzo over 200 monks were killed, and many more exiled (CecZeila I, 381). Other sources, however, do not corroborate the story.

Wazena

W. or Wäzän(ä) (ወዘነ, WZN, var. ዘወዘነ, ZWZN, customarily read Zä-Wäzen[ä] or Zä-Wäzän[ä]) is the conventional form of the name of a late 6th/early7th-cent. Christian king of ↗Aksum for which, however, an original vocalization *Wezana cannot be excluded by way of comparison with the (non-Semitic) pattern of ↗Ebana, ↗ᶜEzana, *Ḥetaza (s. ↗Ḥataz), etc. Possibly a successor of ↗Əlla ᶜAmida II, with whom he has been groundlessly identified (MHAksum 84; Hahn 2000: 298f., pl. 311; 2010/11: 15f.), and a predecessor of ↗Əllä Gäbäz II, he is known from his silver and copper ↗coinage alone. Yet, it seems that the name WZN – in no way corresponding to "Ousanas in Greek" (so Munro-Hay 1984: 114f., but s. Bausi 2003: 166f. and nn. 25f.) – appeared, "most probably connected with a royal title", in a fragmentary portion of the never published, nor any longer available, "monumental inscriptions" found by Antonio ↗Mordini in his excavations at the "late Aksumite" site of Maryam ↗Nazret (Mordini 1949: 9 and n. 1, albeit mistaking WZN for the name of a realm/territory "separated from Aksum" or a part of an otherwise unknown "royal title"; cp. Id. 1944–45: 10 and n. 2).

W.'s silver issues (Types 117–17i in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 214ff.) display, on the obv., the king in a beaded outer border, head and shoulders bust full face, robed in a garment consisting of two panels of almost vertical pleats, some slightly curved, falling from each side, leaving a third panel free in the centre with two (or three?) horizontal stripes or perhaps a cross held in a hand folded across his chest. He wears a subrectangular crown, often gilt (s. Hahn 2002: 125f., fig. 13), or a semicircular diadem, both of large beads, the area between the diadem and the eyebrows being also gilt, with a small cross in the middle of the forehead; the ears are prominent, with earrings. In the field such symbols may be found as a dot, a disc and a crescent; at top, a cross sometimes widely flared. Gəᶜəz legend all round: ንገሠ + ወዘነ, i.e. Nəguś WZN, 'King W.'. On the rev., a central cross voided and inlaid with gold (s. Hahn 2002: 125f., fig. 14), is enclosed by a radial arch on double columns. This is an extremely stylized representation – quite new in the Aksumite numismatic repertoire – of the entrance to the innermost part of the Tomb of Christ in the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem (nothing to do with the "Sacred Book" recognized here by Basile 1995: 236), and foreshadows a design later used frequently in Ethiopian manuscript paintings (Fiaccadori 2003: 199 and 246f.; cp. Munro-Hay in AfrZion 113). Legend all round, with reference to the encircled subject: ዘየዐበየ ለመድኀኒነ + ንገሠ, i.e. Zəyaᶜbəya lämädḫanitä nəguś, 'May this increase the king's salvation' (by taking the cross as ተ, tä, s. Godet 1986: 196 and n. 30, Id. 1991: 324 and Fiaccadori 2003: 199; cp. Bausi 2006: 93f. and n. 31, with previous lit.).

The far more numerous copper examples (Types 118–23 in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 216–22) have, on the obv., the king in a broad and plain outer border, half-length bust rightwards, dressed in the "humped style", wearing the head cloth with a curved ribbon hanging out behind. His arm is sometimes visible (often off the flan), the hand holding a wheat stalk sceptre, occasionally with cross at top, that breaks at different points the Gəᶜəz legend ለአሐዘበ ዘየደለ, i.e. Läᵓaḥzab zəyədl or ዘየደለ ለአሐዘበ, i.e. Zəyədl läᵓaḥzab, 'May this please the people(s)', alluding to the cross on the rev. In the legend, sometimes, a small cross shows separately from the wheat stalk. Possible symbols in the field: one to three pellets, a small cross and a crescent with or without disc. On the rev., in a similar border (random traces of beading), a cross with four arms extending to the coin edges and terminating in smaller crosses that divide the Gəᶜəz legend in four groups: ዘነ+ገሠ+ዘወ+ዘነ+, i.e. Zənəguś Zä-WZN, 'This is King Zä-Wazena' (less probably, Zänəguś Zä-W., 'Of King Zä-W.'; in no way could the king's name be read "[Za-]Wazenaz", as in Hahn 1983: 178, no. 66, 1984a: 133f. and 1984b: 179). Punch hole inlaid with gold at the centre of the cross (s. Hahn 2002: 125f., fig. 11), with four intermediate arms ending in hammer heads. Symbols in the field: one to three dots, cross and crescent.

W.'s silver issues are linked with two silver dies bearing the same religious motto (Zəyaᶜbəya ~ nəguś) on the rev.: the first one is anonymous, with the obv. legend ነገሠ+አክሰመ, i.e. Nəguśä Aksum, 'King of Aksum'; the second one carries a three-letter monogram, ገአደ, usually read 'GD or G'D (hitherto unexplained: the king's name?), just before the obv. legend (Types 125–25ii and 126–26ii resp. in Munro-Hay – Juel-Jensen 1995: 224f. and 226–29, cp. Conti Rossini 1927: 206 [§ 29] and AfrZion 113f., no. 41; further suggestions, including the unsound connection with Wäsän Sägäd of the Ethiopian "king lists", are discussed in Bausi 2003: 166f. and n. 26).

Gianfranco Fiaccadori

Wemmers, Jacob

W. (b. 21 October 1598, Antwerp, 12 September 1645, Naples) was a Dutch scholar. Born to Gisbert and Maria Hanodel, he joined into the Carmelites of the Old Observance in 1617. W. studied theology and Oriental languages, probably within the circle of ↗Santo Stefano dei Mori. In 1635, he was called to Rome as consultant to the ↗Sacra Congregatio de Propaganda Fide. On 3 May 1640 the Congregation delegated him to re-establish the Ethiopian mission, abandoned after the expulsion of the ↗Jesuits in 1632. In his journey, W. was to be accompanied by two aides, a Carmelite and abba Asfa Maryam. On 28 July, Pope Urban VIII sent a letter to the Ethiopian Emperor (aṣe ↗Fasilädäs) asking the ruler to protect the Catholic envoys (Raineri 2005: 202ff.).

Little is known of the fate of this mission. However, W. seems to have reached Cairo as of 1641 (BecRASO I, 176). Back in Rome, on 28 December 1644 he was elected Apostolic Vicar "cum facultatibus in tota Aethiopia" with the title of Bishop of Menphi and consecrated in 1645 in Rome. W. died when leaving for his mission from the port of Naples. He was buried at the Carmelite church in that town (on his epitaph, s. Raineri 2006: 585).

W.'s chief contribution to Ethiopian studies was his Lexicon Aethiopicum (1638). A work with several shortcomings, it was nonetheless the first scientific study of ↗Gəʿəz. Together with abba Asfa Maryam, he also translated the brief Onerosa pastoralis officii of Urban VIII (concerning the foundation of an Ethiopian college) from Latin into Gəʿəz (Raineri 2006: 583) and the ↗Arganonä Maryam into Latin (Raineri 1981: 443).

I. General cultural overview

W. (Amh. ዕንጨት, ənč̣ät) is a basic resource of human culture and an important factor of cultural ecology. It is employed in almost every field of material culture and has a crucial function as 'W. fuel' (Amh. ማገዶ, magädo) or 'charcoal' (ከሰል, käsäl; ↗Forestry). In some cases W. or W. of certain ↗trees may also carry a symbolic value (e.g., the W. of the Holy Cross, s. ↗Mäsqäl). Aromatic W. is used as ↗incense (VSAe II, 102f.).

While in some societies in the Horn of Africa woodwork, carpentry and cabinetmaking can be done by anybody who has the necessary skills (e.g., among the ↗Maale and ↗Ubamär, VSAe I, 177, 309), among many societies these activities belong to a distinct, often endogamous, social group. The peasantry may often consider woodworkers ↗marginalized people (s. EAE vol. 5). The so-called ↗fuga are a classical example of both special social status and excellent workmanship (s. also ↗Handicrafts). In northern Ethiopia woodworkers and carpenters of the ↗Betä Ǝsraʾel played a crucial role, e.g., in the context of Gondärine ↗architecture (↗Gondär). Craftsmen were also among the ↗Kəmant and Muslims.

In the 19th cent. Indian, Greek and European craftsmen increasingly came to Ethiopia to work for different rulers. Among the European carpenters were, e.g., the Swiss Dubois, the German Aichinger and the Italian ↗Naretti. During the Italian occupation European workmanship in cabinetmaking was introduced in a broader range, and furniture shops opened, e.g., in the Arada area of Addis Abäba. Today, in every larger town, furniture workshops can be found.

W. is a major material for building construction (↗Church buildings, ↗Forts, ↗Houses, ↗Mosques). Moreover, Aksumite stone architecture sometimes imitates wooden construction (cp., e.g., ↗Dəgum).

In buildings W. is mostly combined with fibers, clay, stone, and, nowadays, mortar or cement etc. W. types avoided by termites are preferable for construction work (e.g., the wild olive tree for the central pole). However, due to shortage of such types of W., ↗Euphorbia, ↗eucalyptus and ↗bamboo are used for most parts of the construction while durable termite-free W. is reserved for the most important elements.

Apart from the framework, columns and beams, W. is also used for partition walls, balconies, door and window frames as well as door locks, door planks and window shutters. Some buildings, especially Indian-style houses, have a wooden facing. Wooden architectural elements may also have a symbolic function and, thus, may be decorated. Examples of this may be beam-ends carved as Aksumite "monkey-heads", the notched top of the central pole of some houses in southern Ethiopia (VSAe I, fig. 12, 3), door frames (s., e.g., engraved lunar and solar symbols in the house of the king of ↗Yäm, VSAe III, pl. 25) or the decoratively sawn boards of facings and balustrades.

Some buildings, especially Indian-style houses, are almost entirely constructed with W. The house of däğğazmač Täfäri Mäkʷännən (later aṣe ↗Ḫaylä Śəllase I) in Harär and that of šayḫ ↗Ḫʷağalī in Addis Abäba are prominent examples of this type of W. architecture.

Daily life, traditionally, features a wide range of wooden items. Depending on local artisanal tradition these are decorated or left plain. Decoration is often limited to geometrical ornaments or abstract figurative motives; among Christians, ↗crosses are often part of the design. Decoration may be carved, engraved, painted or burnt designs created with a hot poker. Wooden objects are sometimes rubbed with butter for aesthetic and conservation purposes.

Wooden household utensils are, e.g., bowls, dishes, plates, footed trays, drinking cups, mortars, spoons, containers, buckets etc. (s. appendices in VSAe I–II for examples). In general, such utensils are carved by hand, often out of one piece of W. Turnery is not common. Wooden items of daily life also include combs and bowls for foot washing, board games (↗gäbäṭa), gänna balls (↗games), ↗headrests etc. Furniture is mainly made of W. as well, e.g., tripod stools (s. Mingei International Museum 1983: 58f. for a typical example) and chairs, sitting boards (used by women and children), bedsteads, shelves, etc.

Household utensils and furniture of the noble or wealthy resembled those of the peasantry but were often bigger, more finely worked, richer in decoration and made of more durable types of W., e.g., Cordia Africana for representative chairs. Prominent examples for carved wooden objects of the highest quality are to be found at the courts of kings in the ↗Gibe region and, especially, at the court of ↗Ǧimma at ↗Ǧirän (s. Ǧimma Museum). Excellent woodcarving work can be also observed in Harär (s. articles ↗Handicrafts and ↗Lawḥ).

Carved chairs had an important function in the representation of political and/or sacral authority. While ancient royal thrones were mostly made of stone, and in later days the royal seat often resembled a divan (↗alga), the wooden throne (መንበር, mänbär) of aṣe Yoḥannəs IV in Mäq̱älä (by Naretti) and the entire throne room of aṣe Ḫaylä Śəllase I (by Ivan Maranov) were inspired by European models and created by European carpenters.

W. is widely employed as material for agricultural tools. While some tools are made entirely of W. (e.g., the ↗dängʷära digging stick) most combine a wooden shaft with an ↗iron blade or point. Similarly, weapons, such as clubs (e.g., bolota) and some types of ↗spears may be produced entirely of W. while others have wooden shafts and iron heads or blades (s. also ↗swords).

Furthermore, various kinds of wooden sticks are employed as herding sticks. Other sticks have a symbolical function as sceptres or insignia (e.g., the ↗bokkuu). In the religious context the Christian Orthodox mäqqʷamiya prayer staff and the Y-shaped stick of the ↗Šayḫ Ḥusayn pilgrims are to be mentioned.

W. plays a major role in the construction of musical ↗instruments where it may serve as the material of the resonance box or sounding body, the frame, the neck, fiddlesticks and drum sticks etc.

W., especially of the ambač tree (Aeschynomene elaphroxylon), is used for the construction of boats (but cp. also ↗tankʷa which is made of ↗papyrus [s. EAE vol. 5]).

The most prominent form of traditional wooden sculpture is connected with memorial as well as sepulchral culture. Wooden planks, pillars or stelae are used among many ethnic groups to mark ↗graves or to honour the buried. Sometimes graves are also protected by a wooden fence (e.g., graves of Muslims). In southern Ethiopia anthropomorphic sculptures were erected to memorize the "heroic" deeds of a buried warrior in the context of the "killing complex" (↗Meritorious complex), e.g., among the ↗Konso (↗Waakaa; s. Poissonier 2009: 187–256) and ↗Dullay. Examples of painted wooden sculptures connected to graves and shrines of ↗Oromo ↗qaalluu were found in Gore (Illubabor) by Cerulli (CerEt vol. 2, 39–45 and tables 7, 9).

Today, many wooden items are replaced by industrial products made of plastic, aluminium, enamel or metal, while wooden objects may find their way into ↗museums or tourist shops. Often wooden objects of hand-luggage size are directly produced for the ↗tourism market.

II. Wood in traditional Christian art

Decoratively treated W. appears in Ethiopia in several artistic contexts, in connection with architecture, painting and artes minores. Usually the kind of W. cannot be identified with certitude because no dendrologic analysis has been made, though in some cases acacia, wild African olive (Amh. wäyra; Olea Africana), teak (Amh. wänza; Cordia Africana) and ↗koso (Hagenia Abyssinica) can be recognized. Dark W. is sometimes designated by scholars (di Salvo, Mercier) as ebony but it needs to be proved. The most common technique of carving is often combined with painting, incising, inlays and marquetry. Several objects show a marked connection with Copto-Islamic works.

Architectonic designed elements such as columns and pillars with sockets and capitals, arches, lintel-beams, friezes, coffered ceilings, elements of timber roofs and domes, doors, door and window frames, window infill (grilles or trellises) and shutters are preserved in constructed churches dating from the 6th to the 15th cent. The oldest (6th cent.) seem to be the carved and originally painted panels of the ceiling in ↗Däbrä Damo displaying animal and vegetal motifs. Similar panels, but also friezes, arch fragments and capitals (some 50 pieces) originating from ↗Ǝnda Maryam church and probably dating to the 9th cent., are kept in the ↗Asmära Museum. The architectonic elements in ↗Zarema Giyorgis church are dated to the same period. A particularly rich repertory of wooden decoration employing diverse techniques, probably executed in the 11th cent., is preserved in the church of ↗Yəmrəḥannä Krəstos. More modest examples are to be found in the churches of ↗Ǝmakinä Mädḫane ᶜAläm and Lədäta Maryam, as well as in the partly constructed and partly hewn Qirqos Agobo (Aṣbidära), ↗Mikaᵓel Amba and ↗Däbrä Sälam. The same concept of architectonic design but less decorative was applied in 15th-cent. churches such as ↗Betä Ləḥem in Gayənt and ↗Žämmädu Maryam, with the exception of ↗Gundä Gunde church where the woodwork displays an extraordinary level of craftsmanship.

Old W. doors decorated with carvings are preserved in Yəmrəḥannä Krəstos (three pairs, two with figural motifs), in some churches of Lalibäla, in Mikaᵓel Amba, Gʷənagʷəna, and Däbrä Wala Maryam near Askätäm. In circular churches (↗architecture; ↗church buildings) the carvings appear on the beams dividing the entrances between the outer and inner ambulatory, on the window frames and grilles but primarily on the stepped framings of the doors. In the 18th and 19th cent. they developed into intricate compositions as can be seen in several churches around Lake ↗Ṭana. Particularly elaborate window trellises decorate the outer ambulatory of ↗Ç̣äläqot Śəllase.

In old churches, a wooden chancel screen separated the sanctuary from the nave. These were constructions composed of an entrance arch and high panels decorated with carved geometric motifs fastened between wooden pillars or colonnades surmounted by finials. Only two pieces survived in situ (Däbrä Sälam and Zarema Giyorgis) while fragments are preserved in the churches of Mikaᵓel Amba, ↗Ṣəraᶜ Abrəha wä-Aṣbəḥa, Saᵓəse Arbaᶜətu Ǝnsəsa and Maryam Gundəfru (Aṣbidära).

The altar tablets (↗tabot) are most often made of hard W. In accordance with the symbolism ascribed to the altar table, they were marked with a carved or chiselled ↗cross. Much more decorated are the old types of tabots or mänbärä tabots dating to the 12th–15th cent. Executed from a single piece of W., they bear carved decoration in high relief on four sides and on the top. The usual motif is a cross and a cross-like rosette, often shown within an arcade, framed by bands of interlacing or foliate arabesques. Occasionally, figural decoration appears, usually angelic figures understood in the symbolic language as the bearers of the throne of God i.e. the tabot (for instance Betä Ləḥem in Gayənt, where the figures are also painted) and the Crucified Christ (Lalibäla, Betä Maryam; Ṭəlasfäri Ǝsṭifanos in Lasta).

The lecterns (atrons) used for church readings are sometimes made of W. They are large, throne-like constructions on four legs, strapped together with hide thongs having a book support at the top. The simpler type is carved from a single three branched W.-stock, the branches turned to form the stand's legs. An unusual example supplied with four wheels and a device allowing one to change the height is kept in the Gundä Gunde monastery; according to the local tradition it is the work of ↗ᶜƎzra. Another elaborate piece is kept in the church of ↗Zäge Giyorgis. It displays in the lower part an ajouré carved ↗Crucifixion scene, in the upper part a wing with a painted representation of St. ↗George. There is also a portable and low version of the stand, suitable for readers sitting on the floor or on a low stool. It consists of two hinged pieces of W., often decorated with relief carving, which lie flat when closed, creating a triangular cradle when open.

The outer sides and the framing edges of ↗paintings on W. are sometimes decorated with carvings. The repertory includes patterns made of geometrical figures, zigzags, interlacing, pellets and foliated bands. Differently shaped crosses appear regularly in the centre of the composition and occasionally figural representations (e.g. IES 7095). Some carvings are brightly coloured. This kind of decoration is commonly applied in pendant diptychs dating to the 17th and 18th cent. In these objects, often made of wild olive, carvings also cover the top and the bottom of the panels and the suspension loop. ↗Chojnacki (s. EAE vol. 5), who worked with the pieces belonging to the collection of the ↗Institute of Ethiopian Studies, distinguished seven types of carved compositions in that group.

W. was and still is an important material for production of crosses, mostly hand crosses but also large, shafted and small pendant crosses, and exceptionally processional crosses. Carved out of one piece they present great diversity of form and decoration. The complex patterns are created by drilling holes through the W., transforming the surface into a delicate web. Some crosses may have a space left on both sides of the bottom panel and of the head for figural representations, painted, incised or carved. Elaborate examples have small paintings carved on the rear (Fogg 2001, no. 16). The repertory of figural representations includes Mary and Child, the Trinity, the Crucifixion, angels and saints. The earliest examples of wooden crosses are dated to the 15th/16th cent. The ↗Stephanites were particularly skilled in that kind of woodwork and some laboured examples of hand crosses decorated with glass and metal inlays are still preserved in ↗Gundä Gunde monastery. The tradition survived in the area, as witnessed by a large group of shafted and large hand crosses with glass inlays dating to 17th and 18th cent. and preserved in the churches of ↗ᶜAgamä. There is a small group of hand crosses dated to the 19th cent. that have the handle transformed into a human figure supporting the head of the cross. Small crosses are often added to wooden rosaries.

Although ↗manuscript boards are made of W., their exterior surface is always left plain but may be covered with leather or metal.

Addenda et Corrigenda

As in any major publication that involves so many people and stretches over so many pages and volumes, a few imperfections can crawl in. Some of these are relatively harmless, some, to the editors' great dismay, are quite unfortunate. On the following pages we would like to try to set the record straight and help the readers by providing a complete list of corrections as possible.

The following list is not exhaustive, but we hope it provides the users of the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica with the necessary tool to the proper readings of the articles, bibliographies, maps and legends. Some of the imprecisions that, in some way, have already been corrected in the published volumes are not additionally repeated in the list, except for the "corrigenda sheet" in vol. 3. Thus, the misprints and occasional omissions in the first part of the edition including the Notes for the User and the Bibliography have been corrected in the present volume and are not repeated below. In the same way, some of the geographic imprecisions of the basic data on the article maps have been gradually improved, also thanks to the increase of the availability of the mapping data. While we tried to apply as much consistency as possible, especially when the names are cross-referenced within the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica, many of the places in Ethiopia, or personalities in Ethiopian history, are known under different names or spelt in different forms. We chose to not overimpose the standardization and leave the final choice of the name variant to the authors of the articles. The index in this volume puts all variants and alternative forms together, providing the ultimate help in the identification of places and persons.

In addition to correcting misprints and small omissions, we also offer some updates and additions. Corrections below concern not only the text of the articles but also the captions and images; a set of maps that had to be revised or that were missed in the previous volumes is also supplied.

517a/b	6 from bottom– 5 from the top	In spite of the arcaic “apocalyptic” traits of the F.I., its manuscript tradition hardly goes back to the time prior to the 17th cent. (cp. Basset 1909:12): in the presumably earliest ms., the 16th-cent. Paris, BN Éth. 113, the folios with the F.I. seem to have been added after the manuscript was prepared (s. ZotBNat 131); other mss. date to later periods (cp., e.g., BN Éth. 123; unclear is the age of ms. Berlin, Peterm. II, Nachtr. 55).	The archaic “apocalyptic” traits of the F.I. are confirmed by the old manuscript traditions. Conti Rossini dated mss. Paris, BN d’Abbadie 111 and 134 to the 15th cent. (CRAbb 53, 74). More recently, ms. d’Abbadie 134 was dated to an even earlier time, around 1350 (UhlPal 129). Neither of the two early 20th-cent. editors/translators of the work (Vajnberg 1907; Basset 1909) specifically focused on those manuscripts or emphasized their importance. In presence of these manuscripts, the time of the composition of the work should be corrected to an earlier period, at least late 14th – early 15th cent. Other witnesses include the 16th-cent. Paris, BN Éth. 113 (the folios with the F.I. seem to have been added after the manuscript had been prepared, s. ZotBNat 131); BN Éth. 123; Berlin, Peterm. II, Nachtr. 55. A few previously unknown 18th/19th-cent. manuscripts of the work have been recently recorded in Təgray (Nosntisin 2013, s. index).

p̣ap̣p̣as	Gəᶜəz ጳጳስ ‘metropolitan, metropolitan archbishop’, from Greek, ecclesiastical title used in Gəᶜəz sources to designate the Coptic metropolitan sent to Ethiopia; equivalent of the Ar. muṭrān ‘metropolitan archbishop’. The metropolitan of Ethiopia, like his counterparts in Egypt, lost his archepiscopal right to consecrate bishops probably during the 13th-14th cent. In 1929 and 1948, Ethiopian monks could be consecrated as bishops or p̣ap̣p̣as. Since then the bishop administrating a diocese bears the title p̣ap̣p̣as, in theory supervising an ep̣p̣isqop̣os or suffragan bishop; s. also article and index.
paşa	Ottoman Turkish (Ar. bāšā; Engl. sp. pasha), title of an officer or provincial governor appointed by the Ottoman state; s. also ↗bašša.
patriyark, patrəyark	Gəᶜəz/Amh. ፓትሪያርክ, ፓትርያርክ, from Gr., ‘patriarch’, ecclesiastic title used since the 19th cent. to refer to the Patriarch of Alexandria (instead of liqä p̣ap̣p̣asat, s. above) and, since 1959, also for the Patriarch of the autocephalous ↗Ethiopian Orthodox Täwaḥədo Church. The patriarch has the authority to consecrate archbishops (liqä p̣ap̣p̣asat), metropolitans (p̣ap̣p̣as) and bishops (ep̣p̣isqop̣os).
qabeen gärad	Cushitic ‘leader of the Qabeena’, s. also ↗gärad.
qāḍī	Ar., title of an Islamic judge.
qalä p̣ap̣p̣as, qaläp̣p̣as, etc.	Gəᶜəz ቃለ ፡ ጳጳስ ‘spokesman of the p̣ap̣p̣as’, ecclesiastic office.
qalä itäge	Gəᶜəz ቃለ ፡ ኢተጌ ‘spokesman of the itäge’, s. also ↗ətege.
qalä ḥəmmät	Gəᶜəz ቃለ ፡ ሕመት obscure, hypothetically ‘secretary’.
qal	Gəᶜəz ቃል lit. ‘word’, ‘spokesman’.
qalä nägaśi, qalä nəguś	Gəᶜəz ቃለ ፡ ነጋሢ, ቃለ ፡ ንጉሥ ‘spokesman of the nägaśi, spokesman of the nəguś’.
qalä ḥaṣ́e	Gəᶜəz ቃለ ፡ ሐፄ ‘spokesman of the ḥaṣ́e’.
qäññazmač	Amh. ቀኛዝማች ‘azmač of the right [wing]’; rank of a military commander between grazmač and däğğazmač, applied also to administrators, esp. in conquered areas; s. also azmač and index.
qäññ geta	Amh. ቀኝ ፡ ጌታ ‘master of the right’, title for a liturgical officiant; s. also index.
qäsä gäbäz, qasisä gäbäz, qäysä gäbäz etc.	Gəᶜəz/Amh. ቀሰ ፡ ገበዝ, ቀሲሰ ፡ ገበዝ, ቀይሰ ፡ ገበዝ, a priest with administrative functions, also ↗gäbäz.
qäs ḥaṣani	Gəᶜəz/Amh. ቀስ ፡ ሐጻኒ, royal father confessor, s. also ↗ḥaṣani; näfs abbat.
qäsis	Gəᶜəz ቀሲስ ‘priest’, ecclesiastical title for a priest who celebrates the Divine Liturgy, absolves the sins, teaches, baptizes and blesses; s. article and index.

qaṭ	Gəᶜəz ቃጥ, also ቃጽ qa, attested also in Ar. sources, ancient title for a provincial governor in the Christian as well as in the Islamic context; s. article and index.
qes	Amh. ቄስ ‘priest’, ecclesiastical title for a priest who celebrates the Divine Liturgy, absolves the sins, teaches, baptizes and blesses; s. also index.

ras	Amh. ራስ ‘head, prince’, title of a ruler ranking directly below a nəguś; s. article and index.
rašo	Käfa ‘head’, administrative title, often in composite titles, e.g., worafe rašo ‘head of the province’, chief of a raše šowo (‘head’s land’); gučče rašo ‘head of the slaves’, state official in control of slave trade and human labour resources in general, also head of the state counsel and in some cases empowered to remove the Käfa ↗tato from office; kätäma rašo ‘head of the camp’, commander of the king’s guard and councilor of state appointed by the tato due to military merit; nagaada rašo ‘chief of trade’, an officer in charge of trade affairs and taxes (cp. näggäd azmač) and spokesman or chief of the Käfa Muslims; aade rašo ‘head of the roads’, responsible for the construction and care of the roads. In the southern ↗Gonga states raša (Hinnaryo [↗Ǝnnarya], ↗Šeko) or rasa (↗Boša) was used in similar ways.
rəᵓəsä liqanä p̣ap̣asat	Gəᶜəz ርእሰ ፡ ሊቃነ ፡ ጳጳሳት, lit. ‘the chief of the archbishops’, honorific title of the head of the Ethiopian Orthodox Täwaḥədo Church since 1959, probably the equivalent in Gəᶜəz of the title held by the Coptic Patriarch of Alexandria, “Lord archbishop”; s. also index.
rəᵓəsä rəᵓusan	Gəᶜəz ርእሰ ፡ ርኡሳን, lit. ‘chief of the chiefs’, honorific title given to the abbot of Märṭulä Maryam monastery and several other churches.
rēdántu/rēzánto	ᶜAfar title for a regional ruler, used as equivalent of ↗sulṭān; applied in the northern ᶜAfar country.
sängaqoro	Amh. ሰንጋቆሮ, tax collector ranking above the ↗č̣əqa šum.
ṣäḥafe lam	Gəᶜəz/Amh. ጸሓፌ ፡ ላም ‘one who registers the cows’, function and title of a governor; s. article and index.

Introduction to the map section

This section is intended to provide the reader of the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica with cartographic material to improve the understanding of some of the data referred to in the articles. The present series of maps covers a vast array of themes.

Maps 1 and 2 deal with physical and geographical topics. Map 3 focuses on the languages of Ethiopia and Eritrea. Maps 4 to 20 illustrate different historical periods, from prehistoric times to the present. Maps 21 to 31 present the administrative division of Ethiopia, Eritrea, Djibouti, and Somalia. The corpus includes materials that have been mapped for the first time.

The preparation of the maps, especially those concerning historical processes and formations, has not been an easy task. On occasion, some important historical features had to be mapped on the basis of scant historical evidence. Complex diachronic developments such as migrations, processes of state-formation or consolidation of power, were only presented in a static, two-dimensional form. Further problems arose from conflicting interpretations of the historical events, which were not represented with the accuracy that had hoped for.

Maps 3a and 3b show a necessarily schematic representation of language borders. The reader should be aware that these borders only ideally mirror the multi-ethnic and linguistic realities of the respective areas on the ground and do not take into account the natural fuzziness of these boundaries.

Maps 5a and 5b show some important, although not all, boundary agreements that have been signed between Ethiopia, her neighbouring polities and the different colonial powers. A selection of the several border agreements signed throughout history was necessary due to the amount of historical materials available. The presentation of boundaries here is limited to one set of original data (Hertslett, Atlas, s. sources), since other materials, using a different scale, would have distorted the boundaries due to the technical process of geo-referencing. The borders shown do not claim legal accuracy. The topography of the area has intentionally been left out, to give the map a more schematic and less "realistic" look.

Map 8 shows the distribution of major excavated and not excavated archaeological sites in Ethiopia and Eritrea, dating between the 1st millennium B.C. and the 1st millennium A.D. Most of them are mentioned in the corresponding Encyclopaedia Aethiopica articles, others have been included to provide a complete and updated archaeological map of these regions. The term "Pre-Aksumite culture", nowadays largely debated, is used conventionally in this context to refer to the archaeological cultures that emerged in northern Ethiopia/central Eritrea during the first half of the 1st millennium B.C. Although it is not a primary site, but a cache containing chronologically mixed artifacts, ᶜAddi Gälämo has been displayed on the map due to the historical relevance of some of the items recorded.

Maps 9 and 10 illustrate the Christian Kingdom during the Zagʷe and early Solomonid periods. The boundaries shown are approximate and they should not be seen as modern administrative boundaries, but rather as the area of maximum range of influence of the state. The same applies to Map 14 on the Zämänä mäsafənt, where only the maximum potential extension of control by the state is represented. Similarly, Map 15 illustrates the spatial location of the most important ethnic and political units in southern Ethiopia shortly before they were integrated into Mənilək II's empire. The reader should take into account that political and ethnic boundaries are approximate and the classification of the different polities under such terms as "chiefdom", "kingdom" etc. is not meant to be an actual description of the political functioning of the unit in question. Due to insufficient souces on the historical distribution of a unit or a set of migration movements, the present location of the ethnic or political unit was used.

Map 17 shows important Muslim sites in mixed religious areas. Obvious Muslim centres such as Massawa, Baylūl, ᶜAsäb or Djibouti have thus been excluded here despite their rich Muslim heritage.

Whenever possible regional writing systems were used for the transliteration of administrative maps (21–31). Otherwise, transliteration relies on the Amharic version of "The Atlas of Ethiopian Rural Economy" (Addis Ababa 2006).

The software ArcGIS 10 by ESRI has been used for the technical preparation of the maps. For the conceptualization of the maps a variety of sources, textual as well as cartographic, have been used. A database containing over 1,000 maps found in books and other publications was set up with the help of Janneke Langen-Hegemann. Additionally, some maps have benefited from field research. All the sources used have been listed at the end of the map section. Several data sources available on the Internet have been used for hypsometry, hydrography, infrastructure (road and rail networks), and settlements. Most prominent among these sources were the Diva-Gis-Project (developed by Robert Hijmans, www.diva-gis.org) and the free data provided by the GISDataDepot of Geocommunity (www.geocomm.com). The original hypsometric data was provided in "feet" (1 foot = 0.305 m). The altitudes in feet were converted into metric values rounded to 100 m, e.g., "1,000 feet" became "300 m" instead of the exact 305 m, "12,000 feet", "3,700 m" instead of the exact 3,660 m.

The maps have further benefited from the help of many individuals who have given advice and comments according to their expertise, namely Abbebe Kifleyesus, Jon Abbink, Stéphane Ancel, Azeb Amha, Giulio Calegari, Gabriele Ciampi, Sophia Dege, François-Xavier Fauvelle Aymar, Éloi Ficquet, Gidena Mesfin, Alessandro Gori, Federica Guazzini, Grover Hudson, James McCann, Didier Morin, Denis Nosnitsin, Wolbert Smidt, Solomon Gebreyes, and Irma Taddia.

Index

Introduction

On the following pages you will find the general Index to the complete Encyclopaedia Aethiopica. With its 4,872 entries, it is the most useful key to the information provided in all the five volumes published.

With this powerful tool, a reader interested to learn more about a particular person, place, ethnic group, cultural object, literary work, theological concept or other abstract notion, shall find all relevant mentions of the subject, whether there exists a specific article dedicated to it or not. For example, while there is a comprehensive article about Ḫaylä Śəllase I in volume 2, it by no means covers all the information the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica has on Ḫaylä Śəllase I. The Index provides references to the main article but also to well over 400 further relevant pages in the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica as well as a series of cross-references to other Index entries directly related to this historical figure. As another example, while there are no independent articles dedicated to the figure of Adam, or to the port of Aden, or to the concept of patrilineality, the relevant Index entries list dozens of page references where the interested reader shall be able to find the necessary information.

All references indicate the relevant volume in bold-faced Roman numerals (I to V) followed by reference pages after a colon, with columns indicated by letters "a" (left column) and "b" (right column). Bold type is used to highlight references to the actual article on the subject if present in the Encyclopaedia. Most of the headings are identified by a descriptive word ("qualifier", see also the list of abbreviations below). The most important variants of a name are placed in brackets. Illustrations and maps are indexed and appear as subheadings immediately below the heading under the terms "ill." and "map". Additional references below the heading refer to other articles containing information on the subject and appear as subheadings indented to indicate different levels of subordination. Cross-references to other relevant Index entries, marked as "s. also", are placed at the bottom of the headings.

The general Index of the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica considers proper names, orientalia, geographical names, titles and subjects. The reader will be able to easily identify these different categories by looking at the qualifier and at the type used: orientalia and titles are always italicized.

Headings are listed in alphabetical order following a word by word system, thus: "Naṣr b. Bali", "Naṣraddīn", "Naṣraddīn b. Aḥmad", "Naṣraddīn b. Dalḥūy b. Manṣūr", "Naṣrallāh". All numerals that might be expected to occur at the beginning of entries are spelled out. In the case of homonyms that cannot be distinguished by qualifiers, further information, such as the date or place, is provided in brackets. Diacritical marks or hyphens do not affect alphabetization. Names of classical oriental works beginning with such general germs as Gädl, Kitab or Mäṣḥaf are indexed according to the second term of the title. Definite and indefinite articles are not considered in filing. When book or film titles start with an article, it appears at the end of the heading. Arabic names with an initial article have been left unchanged but the entry is alphabetically ordered according to the first meaningful word.

The standardization of orientalia carried out in the Encyclopaedia Aethiopica articles has been further accomplished in the general Index. All variants are registered, and cross-references guide the reader to the main spelling. The reader may eventually notice some slight discrepancies between the text and the Index headings. Whenever this occurs, bear in mind that the ultimate reference for transcription is the one given by the Index.
